

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

ARGUED AND DETERMINED

IN THE

Court of KING's BENCH,

AND

UPON WRITS OF ERROR FROM THAT COURT

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER,

IN

Easter Term,

In the Fifth Year of the Reign of WILLIAM IV.

The Judges who usually sat in Banc this term were,

Lord DENMAN C. J. PATTESON J.

LITTLEDALE J. COLERIDGE J.

MEMORANDA.

ON the 23d of April, in this term, Lord Lyndhurst resigned the Great Seal, which, on the 24th, was put into commission, and the Right Honourable Sir Charles Christopher Pepys, Knight, Master of the Rolls, the Right Honourable Sir Launcelot Shadwell, Knight, Vice-Chancellor, and the Right Honourable Sir John Bernard Bosanquet, Knight, one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, were appointed Commissioners.

In the course of this term Sir Frederick Pollock, Knight, resigned the office of Attorney-General, and was succeeded by Sir John Campbell, Knight; and Sir 1835. William Webb Follett, Knight, resigned the office of licitor-General, and was succeeded by Robert Mow Rolfe, Esquire, who afterwards received the honour of knighthood.

DOE dem. The Hon. FREDERICK LUMLEY against JOHN LUMLEY SAVILE, Earl of SCARBOROUGH
(In Error.)

Lands were devised to A. for life, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male; remainder to B., A.'s younger brother, for life; remainder to B.'s first other sons successively in tail male; remainders to other younger brothers of A.; remainders to their sons successively in tail male; remainders over. The will provided first, that every person who should become under the will entitled to possession of certain premises, being part of the lands devised, should take the name, &c. of S. certain time; and, in default thereof (such default being made during certain live being, or within twenty-one years after the survivor's decease), that the devise to such person should become void, and the lands should go to the person next in remainder as if the person making default were dead, if tenant for life, or dead without male issue if tenant in tail: secondly, that if the title to a certain earldom should descend upon or any of his younger brothers, or any of his or their sons during the life of A. or of any of his younger brothers, or within twenty-one years after the survivor's decease, the estate of such person, to whom the title should come, should cease, and the lands should go to the person next in remainder expectant upon the decease and failure of issue male of such person to whom the title should come, in the same manner as if the person on whom the title descended were dead without issue, such person next in remainder taking the name &c. of S. as aforesaid.

Held, first, that the proviso for shifting the estate in case of the descent of the title, was not confined to A.'s estate, but attached to all the estates created by the will, as they successively vest in possession.

Secondly, that on the title descending to any tenant for life, the estates were to go to his issue, but to the next branch of the family.

A., being in possession, a common recovery was suffered, in which the lands were conveyed (by lease and release by A. and his eldest son) to a tenant to the praepice, during the joint lives of such tenant and A.; and A.'s eldest son was vouched over, but A. was not vouched; afterwards the title descended upon A.:

Held, first, that such recovery destroyed all remainders expectant upon the natural determination of the estate tail of A.'s son, and the proviso for shifting the estates in event of the title descending, so far as it was attached to that estate tail, and all remainders or subsequent estates limited to come into possession on the descent of the title upon such son, grandson, &c.

But, secondly, that B. was entitled to claim by virtue of the proviso, not merely defeating or determining the estate tail, but as operating antecedently to that estate; that such antecedent claim was not barred by the recovery.

While A. was in possession, B. and his eldest son, by deed truly reciting the facts, released their interest to trustees: Admitted that, this being a release of a possibility to a party not privy in estate, and the whole truth appearing by the deed, no legal interest passed either by way of conveyance of interest or by way of estoppel.

1833, before Bolland B., the parties agreed that the jury should find a special verdict, and that judgment should be given in the court of the county palatine for the defendant; upon which judgment the present writ of error was brought. The special verdict found the following facts: —

Sir George Savile, being seised in fee of the premises in question, and also of certain lands in Nottinghamshire, by his last will and testament, dated 18th August 1783, devised the same to trustees, to the use of certain persons therein named for twenty-one years from the day of his death, upon certain trusts; and after the determination of that term, and subject thereto, to the use of certain other persons therein also named for 500 years from thenceforth, on certain trusts; and, after the determination of that term, and subject thereto and to the trusts thereof, in the mean time, to the use of his the testator's nephew, the Honourable Richard Lumley, second son of the testator's sister, Barbara Countess of Scarborough, by the then late Earl of Scarborough, for life; remainder to the use of trustees to preserve contingent remainders; remainder to the use of the first son of the body of the said Richard Lumley lawfully begotten, and the heirs male of the body of such first son, lawfully issuing; and for default of such issue, to the use of the second, third, fourth, and all and every other the son and sons of the body of the said Richard Lumley lawfully begotten, whether born in the lifetime of the said Richard Lumley or after his decease, severally, successively, and in remainder, one after another, as they and every of them should be in priority of birth, and the several and respective heirs male of the body and bodies of all and every such son and sons lawfully quartering the arms of Savile as aforesaid: Provided nevertheless, that any such cesser &c. (as before, for preserving jointures, and other charges on the estate). The will also gave power to Richard Lumley, when in possession, to charge the lands with a jointure for his wife; and a further power to him, and the other younger sons of the then late Earl of Scarborough by the testator's sister, when in possession, to charge the lands with portions for daughters and younger sons, and with payments for their maintenance, &c.; and with powers, of leasing, &c. to the persons successively entitled, when in possession; and there was also a provision for the cesser of the term of 500 years.

Sir George Savile died in January 1784, leaving Richard Lumley, John the defendant, the said Frederick Lumley, Savile Henry Lumley, and William Lumley, in the said will named, him surviving. At the time of the death of Sir George Savile, the title of Earl of Scarborough was vested in George Augusta Lumley, then Earl of Scarborough, the eldest son of the testator's said sister Barbara, by the said then late Earl of Scarborough. After the death of Sir George Savile, the events in which it was provided by the said will that the said term of 500 years should cease and determine took place; and thereupon the same term ceased and determined accordingly. Afterwards the said Richard Lumley, under and by virtue of the said will, entered into possession of the premises in the declaration mentioned, and, pursuant to the direction in that behalf contained in the said will, took upon himself and used the name of Richard Lumley Savile, and quartered the arms of Savile with his family arms, and in all other respects complied with the provisions in that behalf contained in the the said will. In September 1807, the said George Augusta, Earl of Scarborough, died without issue, and the title of Earl of Scarborough descended to the said Richard Lumley Savile; and thereupon the above-named defendant, under and by virtue of the aforesaid devise, entered into the possession of the premises in the declaration mentioned, and took the name of John Lumley Savile, and quartered the arms of Savile, &c., and in all other respects complied with the provisions of the will in that behalf. The defendant was found by the verdict to be in the possession of the same premises. John Savile Lumley, commonly now called Viscount Lumley, was and is the eldest son of the defendant.

By indentures of lease and release, of the 27th and 28th of November 1809 (the release made between the defendant of the first part, Lord Lumley, by the name of John Savile Lumley, then aged twenty-one, of the second part, and three other persons of the third, fourth, and fifth parts respectively), the lands were conveyed by the defendant and Lord Lumley to a tenant to the præcipe for the joint lives of such tenant and the defendant, to the use of the tenant to the præcipe during such joint lives for the purpose of a common recovery being suffered to such uses as the defendant and Lord Lumley should appoint, which recovery was afterwards suffered with double voucher, the vouchees being Lord Lumley and the common vouchee; and afterwards, by deed of the 28th of May 1812, the defendant and Lord Lumley appointed the uses of the recovery to the defendant for life, remainder over. Lumley the younger. The first annuity was regularly paid till the death of Frederick Lumley the elder, which took place in September 1831. Frederick Lumley the younger was the lessor of the plaintiff, and the only son of Frederick Lumley the elder. The second annuity had been paid regularly, since the death of Frederick Lumley the elder, till the death of Richard Lumley Savile, Earl of Scarborough, who died on the 17th of June 1832, without issue male, when the title descended upon the defendant.

The case was argued in Michaelmas term, (14th and 18th of November 1834) (a).

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, for the plaintiff in error (the plaintiff below).

In order to shew the right of the lessor of the plaintiff to recover, there are three points to be established: First, that the interests of the lessor of the plaintiff, and of his father, being possibilities not assignable at law to strangers, no legal interest passed to the trustees under the deeds of 1817 (b): Secondly, that the deed of release of 1817 having disclosed the whole truth of the case, it does not operate by way of estoppel (c): and, Thirdly, that the recovery did not bar the use which was to arise under the proviso for shifting the uses on the accession of the earldom. [Preston, for the defendant in error, admitted that he could not controvert either of the first two points.] Then, the only question between the parties relates to the effect of the recovery.

As respects this point the case stands thus:—Devise to the defendant for life; remainder to trustees during his life; remainder to his eldest son in tail, with a proviso, that if a given event (the accession of the earldom) happen during the life of the defendant, or within twenty-one years afterwards, the lands shall remain to the use of the lessor of the plaintiff. The defendant conveys to A., during the joint lives of himself and A., to make him tenant to the præcipe, and the eldest son is vouched in a recovery. Then the event happens during the life of the defendant, and the question is, whether the use to arise under the proviso is barred by the recovery. It will be most convenient to consider, I., whether the proviso would have been barred if it had been restricted to the case of the event happening during the life of the defendant; and, if not, then, II., whether the circumstance of the proviso not being so restricted, makes any difference.

I. First, upon general principles, the recovery ought not to bar the use to arise under such a proviso. There are two points of view in which recoveries are spoken of in the books. In the very old cases recoveries are treated as real actions; but in all modern authorities they are treated as common assurances. If recoveries were now to be regarded as real actions, it might be difficult to contend that the proviso would not be barred; because, according to that view, the estate gained by the recovery would be recovered by title paramount to the estate tail, and thus paramount to all the estates limited by the will creating the entail, and, consequently, paramount to the use which arises under the

the proviso in question. But it is perfectly clear that a common recovery now is, and for a long period has been, regarded by the courts and the legislature as a mode of assurance: Benson v. Hodson (a), Martin dem. Tregonwell v. Strachan (b). When the latter case came before the House of Lords, Willes C. J., who delivered the judgment, said (c), "I shall consider them" (common recoveries) "only as common assurances, and not at all as real transactions, being of opinion that all the confusion which has arisen concerning these recoveries has been occasioned by resembling a common recovery to another recovery, by considering it as a real transaction." Taking recoveries, then, to be a mode of assurance, it ought to follow on principle, that the interest passed by the recovery of tenant in tail is an interest derived out of his estate tail; and this is clearly established in Capel's case (d), where, upon the principle that "the recoveror is in of an estate which he hath gained under the tenant in tail in possession," it was held, that an estate gained by recovery suffered by tenant in tail is not subject to a rent-charge granted by the remainder-man. So in Benson v. Hodson (e) the Court came to a similar decision, on the principle, that "the recoveror comes in in the continuance of that estate that is not subject to the rent, but is above all those charges." Again, in The Appeal of the Lord Derwentwater (a), where a papist, being a tenant in tail, suffered a common recovery, and declared the uses to himself and his heirs, it was held, that this was not a purchase within the stat. 11 & 12 W. 3. c. 4. s. 4. (b), but a modification of the family estate, on the principle, that he took no new estate by the recovery by way of purchase, but was in of his old estate. And so in Martin dem. Tregonwell v. Strachan (c), and Roe dem. Crow v. Baldwere (d), upon the principle, that on a recovery the new use arises wholly out of the estate tail, it was held, that the estate gained by a recovery suffered by a tenant in tail, who did not come in as a purchaser, will descend as the estate tail would have done; that is, it will go to the heir ex parte paternâ, or maternâ, according as the estate tail was derived from the paternal or maternal ancestor. From these cases, therefore, it is clear that the recoveror is in under the estate tail; and that the fee simple gained by the recovery is an estate derived out of the estate tail. The rule is stated accordingly in note (7.) to 2 Wms. Saunders, p. 42 n. (e). If it be asked, how a larger estate can be derived out of a less? the proper answer is, as Willes C. J. said in Martin dem. Tregonwell v. Strachan (g), that the reason of the operation of the Cotton*, 3 Atk. 751., it was held, that for waste done before the recovery, the quondam tenant in tail might bring waste after the recovery: see pp. 756, 757.

(c) Willes, 448. So in White v. West, Cro. Elix. 793. (cited p. 512, post) the Court expressly distinguished between a common recovery and a recovery by title, and said that the latter defeated the estate utterly: the main point decided there being, that if land be given to W. in tail, rendering rent, the rent shall remain a charge on the land after a common recovery suffered by W.

recovery is a thing in its nature inexplicable. It is sufficient that the principle is clear, and that in the cases above cited it was made a ground of legal inference and decision. From the principle it necessarily follows, that the derivative estate recovered must be subject to whatever the entire estate tail, out of which it is derived, was itself subject to: and applying this inference to the present case, it is clear that the fee gained by the recovery is subject to the use to arise under the proviso. The effect of limiting an estate to A. for life, remainder to B. in tail, with a proviso that, if a given event happens during the particular estate, the lands shall go over to C., obviously must be to make the limitation to B. wholly subject, on the given event, to the limitation over to C.; and, a fortiori, an estate derived out of the interest so limited to B., must also necessarily be subject to the same limitation over.

Secondly, there is abundant authority illustrating and supporting the proposition, that the estate gained by the recovery is subject to the estates to which the entire estate tail was subject; and one express decision that the estate acquired by the recovery in the present case is subject to the use arising under the proviso. It is clear law that charges created by the donor before the creation of the entail are not barrable by recovery. In White v. West(a), where a gift was made by A. to B. in tail, rendering rent, it was held that a recovery by B. did not bar the rent, a decision which seems to turn on the principle that the reservation is a charge on the estate tail itself. So in Mr. Butler's note to Co. Litt. 203. b. (n. 1. sect. 4.) it is said, "Supposing A. to be tenant for life, with the usual powers of leasing, jointuring, and charging; remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; remainder to A.'s first and other sons in tail male; remainder to his daughters as tenants in common in tail, with cross remainders in tail between them, if more than one, with remainders over; A. and his daughters may suffer a common recovery: and it will be good against A. and his daughters, and their issues in tail, and the remainders over. But the estates tail of the sons, being prior to the estates of the daughters, and being supported by the estate of the trustees for preserving contingent remainders, are not, whether vested or contingent at the time of the recovery, affected by it." And so in Eales v. Conn (a), where an estate was limited by marriage settlement to uses, as follows:—To the husband for life, remainder to the wife for life, remainder to trustees for 500 years, remainder to the first and other sons in tail male; the trusts of the term being, first, to raise portions for the younger children (if any), which failed, and, secondly, if the wife should die without leaving any issue of the marriage living at her death, to pay J. Sharland 600*l.*:—the husband died; then the wife and only son suffered a recovery; then the son died without issue, and then the mother died; it was held that the 600*l.* charge was not barred. In Roper v. Hallifax (b) the like principle was applied under circumstances in effect exactly similar to those of the present case. The similarity of the two cases will be seen by comparing the limitations in each:—

The case of Roper v. Hallifax was in effect thus : —

A. for life.
Trustees to preserve.
B. for life.
Trustees to preserve.
C. in tail.

Power to trustees during the lives of A. and B., or the survivor, to revoke and appoint new uses.

Question, whether, a tenant to the præcipe being made by A., and recovery suffered by C., the power will be barred.

The present case is thus : —

A. for life.
Trustees to preserve.

C. in tail.

Proviso that on a given event taking place during the life of A., certain of the old uses shall cease, and new ones take effect.

Question, whether, a tenant to
the præcipe being made by A., and recovery suffered by C., the proviso will be barred.

As a power to alter the uses of a settlement, and a proviso for altering them upon a given event, differ only in the nature of the event upon which the new uses are to arise (a power to alter uses being a proviso that they shall be altered upon the power being exercised), the two cases are exactly similar. Roper v. Hallifax (a) was twice argued, and the decision was that the power was not barred.

Thirdly, all the cases in which a recovery has been held to be a bar to a condition or shifting use have been distinguished from the present case by one marked feature. Here the estate arising upon the descent of the title, is precedent, in point of limitation, to the estate tail. This appears from the words of the proviso of cesser, and of the limitation consequent upon the cesser, and also from the circumstance that the latter is followed by a new provision that the party taking under it shall take the name and arms, which would have been

unnecessary if the estate tail arising under the limitation had merely effected an acceleration of the younger son's estate tail. But, in the cases referred to, the limitation over, or springing use, which was held to be barred, was not precedent in point of limitation to the estate tail (as here), but subsequent. The use did not, as in the present case, spring from a point anterior to the commencement of the estate tail, but only abridged or determined the estate tail after it had commenced in interest and enjoyment. Thus, in Benson v. Hodson, the two following cases are put by Lord Hale (a): — He says, "A man made a gift in tail, determinable upon his nonpayment of a thousand pounds, the remainder over in tail to B. with other remainders; the tenant in tail before the day of payment of the thousand pounds suffered a common recovery, and doth not pay the thousand pounds; yet because he was tenant in tail when he suffered the recovery, by that he had barred all." And again, "if tenant in tail be with a limitation so long as such a tree shall stand, a common recovery will bar that limitation." In both which cases the limitation which is barred is subsequent to the estate tail. So in Page v. Hayward (b) it was laid down that if an estate were limited to Mary and the heirs male of her body by a Searle to be begotten, provided and upon condition that, if she should marry any but a Searle, then the estate should remain and be to J. S. and his heirs; a common recovery suffered before marriage would bar the estate tail and remainders, and her marriage afterwards with another would not avoid the recovery. Here again the limitation over is subsequent to the estate tail. In Gulliver

dem. Corrie v. Ashby (a) an estate was devised according to certain limitations under which Ambrose Saunders became tenant in tail male in possession, and rather more than two years afterwards suffered a recovery; and the will contained a proviso, and the devise was declared to be expressly upon condition, that every person to whom the estates should descend or come should take the name of Wykes; but there was no devise over for non-performance. Ambrose Saunders never took the name, and the question was, whether the estate went over by the proviso? It was held that it did not, on the ground that either this was not a conditional limitation, for want of a devise over, or that, if it was a conditional limitation, it was barred by the recovery. But here also the gift over (if any) must have been subsequent, in point of limitation, to the estate tail. So also in Driver dem. Edgar v. Edgar (b), where the devise was to Mary Edgar in tail, proviso that if she should die not leaving a child or children living at her decease, the estate should be "void, as to inheritance of heirs," and go over; and Mary Edgar suffered a recovery; it was held that she took an estate tail, and that the recovery barred the limitation over. Here also the gift over was clearly subsequent. These cases, therefore, are distinguishable from Roper v. Hallifax (c), and from the present case, in which the springing use does not take effect subsequently to the estate tail, but arises from a point anterior to the commencement of that estate.

Fourthly, the principle on which Page v. Hayward (d) and the like cases depend, has no application to the case of a springing use which arises antecedently in point of limitation to the estate tail, that is, which springs from a point anterior to the commencement of it. The ground on which a recovery bars a remainder expectant on an estate tail is, as was said by Lord Hale in Benson v. Hodson (a), that the recoveror comes in in continuance of the estate tail; so that the remainder never comes into possession. Now it is obvious that this continuance of the estate tail may well prevent any limitation or springing use from taking effect which merely abridges or determines the estate tail, such as the conditional limitation in the case put by Lord Hale (b) of a conveyance to A. and the heirs of his body so long as a tree stands, and then over. The prolongation of the estate tail by the recovery may, on the same principle as it prevents the determination of that estate by the failure of issue, also prevent its determination under a conditional limitation annexed to it. But the mere prolongation of the interest of the tenant in tail can have no tendency to preclude the operation of a proviso which springs from a point anterior to the commencement of the estate tail, and overreaches the entirety of it. In such a case the proviso does not determine the estate tail; it substitutes a new use in the place of the entirety of it, in the same manner as if the limitation in tail had never been contained in the settlement. A distinction much to this effect is suggested in two MS. notes of the late Mr. Serjeant Hill, which have been printed in Sanders on Uses (c). From the first note, it appears that the Ser-jeant at one time considered that Page v. Hayward (a) went too far, and that even in such cases the recovery would not bar the conditional limitations. He afterwards altered this opinion and added a second note, which is as follows:—“N. B. Since the above was written, it seems clear on further consideration, that where an estate is devised to one in fee simple, upon condition, and in case the condition be not performed, then to another; this, if within due bounds, will be good as an executory devise, and therefore not barrable by recovery; because no executory devise can be barred by recovery (at least not unless the person to whom the executory devise is made is vouched in the recovery); yet if in such case, the first devise be not a fee-simple, but a fee-tail, then the devise over will operate, not by way of executory devise, but as a contingent remainder; and consequently a recovery suffered by tenant in tail before the condition, or contingency, happens on which the remainder is to take effect, must extinguish it, because a remainder cannot, though an executory devise may, and always does, subsist without a particular estate to support it; but where lands are devised in tail on condition, and if the condition be broken, then to B.; this, though called a condition, is by reason of the devise over a limitation, or, as it is frequently called, a conditional limitation, and the devise over being limited after a particular estate (viz.) an estate tail which is capable of supporting it, as a contingent remainder, it therefore operates as a contingent remainder, and therefore a recovery suffered (before breach of condition) by the tenant in tail must destroy the contingent remainder by destroying the particular estate, which supported it before the contingency happened; that is, before the remainder vested; for it is a clear rule, that every remainder must vest during the particular estate, or eo instante that it determines, or otherwise it can never vest at all." The deliberate opinion, therefore, of this very learned person was that the principle on which Page v. Hayward (a) and other similar cases depend, applies only to cases where the conditional limitation is subsequent to or expectant on the estate tail, not to a case where the conditional limitation or springing use arises from a point anterior to the commencement of it. This note, taken with the decided cases, justifies the position, that the operation of a recovery, as a bar to a conditional limitation, is in analogy to its operation as a bar to remainders; according to which rule, the right of the plaintiff in this case would be clear, since the analogy holds only as to uses which are subsequent to and expectant on the estate tail, and not as to uses which are antecedent to it.

There are, therefore, two classes of cases with respect to the effect of a recovery in barring a springing use. The first, consisting of cases like Page v. Hayward (a), where an estate tail may be determined or abridged by a conditional limitation, or springing use, annexed to it and expectant upon it; the second, consisting of cases such as Roper v. Hallifax (b) and the present case, where the springing use arises from a point anterior to the commencement of the estate tail, and overreaches the entirety of it. In the first class of cases a recovery by the tenant in tail will bar the springing use: in the second it will not.

All text writers on the subject expressly or impliedly recognise this distinction. In Sugden on Powers, ch. 1. s. 5. V. (a), the author supposes the case of an estate limited to a parent for life, and then to his children, as he shall appoint by will, and in default of appointment, to the children in tail; and observes, "The case has been considered similar to that of Page and Hayward (b). To this opinion the author himself once inclined, but further consideration has induced him to consider the point very doubtful. For, in Page v. Hayward (b), although the words expressed a condition, yet they were construed to be a limitation; and, therefore, it is the common case of a vested estate-tail, with a limitation over in a certain event, in which case it is quite clear that a recovery suffered before the happening of the event will defeat the limitations over. It is like the case put by Hale, Chief justice, in Benson v. Hodson (c), of a tenant in tail, with a limitation so long as such a tree shall stand; and he held, that a common recovery would bar that limitation. But in our case the question would be, whether, during the life of the donee of the power, the estates to be created under the power would not be considered a charge upon the estate tail." These observations were written before the decision of Roper v. Hallifax (d), and the correctness of them was confirmed by that case: the word "charge" is only another mode of describing the interests which, it is insisted, are not barrable. In Cruise's Digest, tit. Recovery, c. 10. s. 1. 3. (e) it is said, "No estates or interests were barred by a common recovery, but those which were subsequent, in point of limitation, to the estate of which the recovery was suffered; for all interests precedent remained as they were before." In Burton's Compendium of the Law of Real Property, after noticing that, in the common case of a settlement, with a power of sale and exchange, to be exercised with the consent of the tenant for life, or tenant in tail in possession for the time being, the power is not barrable during the estate for life, for which proposition the author cites Roper v. Hallifax (a), he remarks thus (b): "The tenant in tail in remainder cannot suffer a recovery without the concurrence of the tenant for life; and even this concurrence will not necessarily destroy the power. For his old estate for life may still continue; and whilst that lasts, any shifting use arising by an exercise of the power given to the trustees must be antecedent to the estate tail, and paramount to it in title; and therefore that power will still continue exerciseable notwithstanding any act of the tenant in tail." In Bayley on Fines and Recoveries (c) it is stated, on the authority of Roper v. Hallifax (a), that "A recovery by tenant for life and remainderman in tail will not destroy a power which is antecedent to the estate tail." In Sanders on Uses (d) the principles above relied upon are distinctly stated and insisted on: he says, "Holt C. J., in Page v. Hayward, 2 Salk. 570, having stated generally his opinion, that a recovery will bar a condition or limitation collateral to the estate tail, for the destruction of which it is suffered, it has been contended, that a recovery will destroy a power, originally reserved with a view to defeat such estate tail. But a recovery has the effect of barring a collateral condition or limitation on the principle, that it bars all remainders expectant upon it; but it cannot affect a use precedent to the estate tail, of which the recovery is suffered; for the recoveror comes in as of the estate of the tenant in tail, and subject to all charges, to which it is subject, and to all limitations preceding it." And afterwards he puts exactly the present case. He says (a), "Suppose lands limited to the use of A. for life, with remainder to B. in tail, remainder to C. in fee, subject to a proviso, that if a certain act be done within the compass of A.'s life, the uses limited to B. and C. should cease, and in lieu thereof, the use should be to D. in fee. It could scarcely be contended, that any act by the tenant in tail could defeat this springing use. It would not, in the sense in which the expression is used, determine the estate tail of B.; but it would prevent its taking effect in possession. It would substitute another estate, in lieu of the estate tail." Before the action in Roper v. Hallifax (b) was brought, an opinion had been written on the case, which is printed in Sanders on Uses, vol. 1. p. 426. (c), and in which the same principles are relied on. The preceding authorities are confirmed by the language of the late statute, 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 74., which, as is well known, was not intended to alter the general powers possessed by a tenant in tail. The fifteenth section of that statute excepts from among the interests which may be barred by tenant in tail "the rights of all persons in respect of estates prior to the estate tail."

Upon a full examination, then, of principles and authorities, the first proposition of the plaintiff appears completely made out. But the same conclusion may be come to, even upon a more general and cursory consideration of the case, and of the principles affecting it. Thus, if lands be limited to the use of A. for life, with a limitation to trustees for a term of 1000 years, with remainder to B. in tail, it is clear that a recovery by B. will not affect the term of 1000 years. Upon the like principles, if the limitation be to A. for life, remainder to B. in tail, with a proviso that, upon a given event happening during the life of the tenant for life, a term of 1000 years shall take effect between the life estate and the estate tail, it is clear that the springing use under this proviso could not be affected by a recovery: and the same conclusion necessarily follows if the term, instead of being for 1000 years, be for 10,000 years, or be indefinitely extended, or if the proviso be that, upon the given event happening during the life of the tenant for life, entirely new uses shall be substituted for the old ones. Or, lastly, the case may be put simply as follows:—If the recovery, instead of being suffered by Viscount Lumley, had been suffered by a remote tenant in tail, for instance by a son of William Lumley, it seems impossible to conceive that such a recovery could have the effect of barring the shifting use, supposing it to have arisen during the life of the defendant. But the only principle upon which that conclusion can be escaped from is, that the use is precedent to the estate tail of such remote tenant in tail, and on that ground is not barrable; and this principle, if applicable to the one case, applies with equal force where the party vouched, instead of being a remote tenant in tail, is entitled to a remainder in tail immediately expectant upon the determination of the life estate.

II. The plaintiff's second proposition is, that as the event has happened during the life of the defendant, the circumstance of the proviso not having been restricted to that event makes no difference. Since the result of the case is the same as if the proviso had been restricted in the manner supposed by the first proposition, the legal conclusion ought to be the same also. But an argument may be attempted to the effect that, by the recovery, the proviso would, according to Page v. Hayward (a), clearly be barred in case of the event not happening till after the defendant's death, and that this circumstance in some way affects the efficiency of the proviso, and prevents its operating at all. In answer to this, the shifting clause may be construed divisim, i. e., as containing in itself several provisos applicable to the estates of the respective takers; that is, one proviso that if the given event should happen during the estate for life, the uses should shift, and so on; and a separate proviso for the time of each estate. Such a construction appears to have been adopted in the case of Boyce v. Hanning (b), where a power of sale, given to trustees, to be exercised with the consent of tenants for life, and after their deaths at the discretion of the trustees, was held valid, apparently on the ground that the power might be considered as comprising two powers; one exercisable during the life estates, which would be good, and the other exerciseable after the determination of those estates. If the like construction be adopted here, the proviso applicable during the estate for life is the proviso which in the event has taken effect, and, therefore, according to the proposition already established, it is not affected by the recovery. These observations, however, enter into niceties which this part of the plaintiff's case does not require. The question arises upon a limitation by way of use, and is, therefore, unaffected by any technical rules; in the event, the case put by the second proposition is identical with the case put by the first proposition; and therefore the legal consequences must be the same.

Preston, for the defendant in error (the defendant below). The defendant rests his case upon four propositions: —

I. The proviso for shifting the estates on the accession of the earldom operated only on the estate for life of the defendant, and its effect was to make only the life estate determine, so as to give the estate over, not to the lessor of the plaintiff, but to his eldest son Viscount Lumley; and, therefore, admitting that the recovery has not barred the proviso, the lessor of the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. The proviso for shifting the estate is in the nature of a forfeiture, and is to be construed strictly, to prevent, as far as possible, a forfeiture from being incurred, as was laid down in the judgment in Doe dem. Luscombe v. Yates (a). It is preceded by a proviso for taking the name and arms of Savile, which is drawn with great skill, and affords a key to the construction of the proviso in question. The name and arms clause contains, first, a provision of cesser directing that the estate of the party who neglects to take the name and arms shall cease, and, secondly, a provision declaring the consequence of such cesser, viz., that the estate shall go over to the person next in remainder ; and it is perfectly clear that the effect of this clause would be to determine the estate of that party only who neglected to take the name and arms. Analogy would lead us to expect that the clause for shifting the estates on the accession of the earldom should have a similar operation, and that it would determine the estate of that party only who acquires the earldom. Accordingly, this is the effect of the clause. It contains, like the name and arms clause, two provisions, viz., first, a provision of cesser, and secondly a provision directing to whom the estate is to go. The provision of cesser only determines the estate of the party who shall become earl, that is, in the present case, the estate of the tenant for life, Lord Scarborough. The directory provision cannot give over more than the provision of cesser takes away ; and, as only the life estate of Lord Scarborough is given over, it must be intended that it should go over to the person next in remainder expectant on that life estate, viz., to Viscount Lumley. This result is supported and confirmed by the following consideration. If the tenant for life had died before the descent of the earldom, and the earldom had descended on a tenant in tail, it cannot be disputed that, under the words of the shifting clause, according to any construction, the estates would have gone over to the next tenant in tail ; that is, to the person next in remainder after the person who became earl. The construction now contended for has the effect of carrying it over in like manner to the person next in remainder after the person who becomes earl, where the earldom descends on a tenant for life : whereas the construction, for which the plaintiff must contend, would, in the latter case, carry it over, not to the person next in remainder after the person who becomes earl, but to the person in remainder after that person and his sons, thus giving a different operation to the clause in the two cases. In Doe dem. Heneage v. Heneage (a), and in Stanley v. Stanley (b), where there were provisions for shifting the estates, the same effect was given to the provisions which is here contended for on behalf of the defendant. In Carr v. The Earl of Errol (c), a different effect was given to the provisions; but in that case the words could not be got over. On these grounds, therefore, admitting the recovery not to have barred the proviso, the lessor of the plaintiff could have no title to recover.

II. The effect of the proviso for shifting the estate upon the accession of the earldom, was to accelerate the old remainders, not to confer new interests. And this is an answer to the argument on the other side, because the acceleration of the old remainders does not render them antecedent to the estate tail; and by the admission of the plaintiff, the recovery bars all except what is so antecedent. The argument urged from the repetition of the provision for taking the name and arms, is of no weight; that repetition was merely inserted ex majori cautelâ. It has been already noticed that the clause upon which the lessor of the plaintiff relies, contains two provisions, viz., first a provision of cesser, and secondly a provision of gift over; and it is obvious that the operation of the clause might be effected by either of these provisions without the aid of the other. Its operation is effected by means of the provision of cesser. This construction must be adopted upon the following considerations. Suppose the lessor of the plaintiff, before the proviso took effect, had granted an annuity, chargeable upon his estate and interest in the property. If the proviso takes effect by way of cesser, accelerating the old remainders, such annuity would continue a charge, notwithstanding the operation of the clause: but, if the proviso takes effect by way of limitation of new uses, the annuitant would have no charge on the new use, and the annuity would be defeated; a result which the Court will not adopt. Again, the provision of gift over directs that the estate shall go only to the person and persons next in remainder. If, therefore, the clause were to be held to take effect under the provision of gift over, it would carry the estate over to the next taker only. It is only by considering the clause to take effect under the proviso for cesser, that is, by way of acceleration, that all the persons entitled in succession in the old line of limitations can be made to take under it. For these reasons the proviso must be held to take effect by means of the provision of cesser; that is, by way of acceleration, and not by way of new use; and then the argument of the plaintiff, which rests wholly on the new use being antecedent to the estate tail, necessarily fails.

III. The estate and interest of the lessor of the plaintiff is subsequent, or at least collateral, to the estate tail of Viscount Lumley, the tenant in tail. It is subsequent, for it divests the estate tail after it is vested. Therefore, being subsequent, it will, according to the rule stated by the plaintiff himself, be barred by the recovery.

IV. Whatever construction is adopted, the plaintiff's reasoning is fallacious, and the recovery has barred the proviso.

proviso. The argument of the plaintiff proceeds upon the principle that the fee gained by the recovery is derived out of the estate tail. But such is not the rule. The true effect of a recovery is to gain a fee simple "so far as the estate was in the donor." It is upon this principle, that charges upon the estate of the donor are not barred by a recovery; and, according to this principle, it is clear that the proviso is barred.

With respect to Roper v. Halifax (a), it is distinguished from the present case by the circumstance that, in that case, it was not the intention of the parties to the recovery to bar the power. Here it was the intention to bar the proviso. The intention was the ground on which that decision was founded.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, in reply.
I. The first proposition of the defendant is in direct contradiction to the words of the proviso for shifting the uses. The result of that proposition would be, that the estate would go over to the issue of the person becoming earl, in the same manner as if such person were dead; whereas the words of the clause are, that the estate shall go over in the same manner as if the person becoming earl "were dead without issue." And as to the arguments in support of the proposition: First, Doe dem. Luscombe v. Yates (b) is not applicable, because the object and effect of this proviso are not forfeiture, but a mode of disposition. Secondly, the name and arms clause does not afford any key to the construction of the clause in question, for the nature and purposes of the two clauses are entirely different. The object of the name and arms clause was to enforce compliance with the requisition for taking the name and arms, by imposing a forfeiture in case of non-compliance, and of course such forfeiture is in all cases confined to the person for whom the punishment is intended; and the estate is consequently in all cases given over to the person next in remainder. But the object of the clause for shifting the estates on the accession of the earldom, was to make provision for a second branch of the family, when an elder branch should succeed to the earldom and its fruits; an object which would not be effected in cases where the person who becomes earl is tenant for life, by giving the estate to the person next in remainder; that is, to the son of such person. In such cases it is necessary, in order that a second branch may be provided for, that the estate should go over to the person who would take the estates if the tenant for life were dead without issue. Thirdly, neither is it true that the plaintiff's construction gives different operations to the clause in the several cases where a tenant for life, and where a tenant in tail, acquires the earldom. In the one case, indeed, the estate goes to the person next in remainder, and in the other it does not. But, in both cases, the estate is carried from the person who becomes earl to the brother of that person, or the issue of such brother, conformably with the design of providing for the next branch. Fourthly, Doe dem. Heneage v. Heneage (a), and the other cases cited by the defendant, were decided (as this case must be) according to the words used in the will or deed.

II. The second proposition on the part of the defendant is incorrect; and, if correct, it would not affect the argument of the plaintiff. As stated for the defendant, the clause consists of two provisions, namely, first, a provision of cesser, and, secondly, a provision of gift over. And it is contended for the defendant, that the operation of the clause is effected by means of the former of these provisions, not of the latter. Now it will be observed, that the provision of cesser directs only, that the estate of the party who becomes earl shall cease; it does not direct that the estates limited to the sons of such person (when a tenant for life) shall cease. But the provision of gift over declares, that the estate shall go over in the same manner as if the person who becomes earl were dead without issue. Therefore the latter provision goes farther than the preceding one; and, in order that the whole intent of the clause may be effected, it must operate under the second provision, namely, by way of limitation of new uses; and not under the previous provision, by way of acceleration merely. The supposed case of an annuity having been granted cannot influence the legal construction of the will; and no argument arises on the ground of hardship or impolicy, because, in whichever way the proviso operates, such annuity would be a charge in equity. To the argument founded on the word "next," it is a sufficient answer, that the proviso directs the estate to go over "in the same manner" as the person or persons in remainder would take the same, in case the party acquiring the title were dead without issue; words which are sufficient to shew that it was intended to go to the several takers in succession. But, further, if the proviso were to be held to take effect by way of acceleration of the old remainders, and not as a limitation of new uses, it would not affect the argument for the plaintiff. The suggested construction could not take effect by virtue of the provision of cesser, because, in order to give effect by way of cesser to the intention that the estates should go over as if the party becoming earl were dead without issue, it would be necessary that all the precedent estates should cease: whereas the provision of cesser in the present case makes only the estate of the tenant for life cease. If, therefore, it be adopted at all, it must be by implying that the estate originally limited in remainder to the plaintiff was intended in the given event to be accelerated; that is, that such estate should, in the given event, take effect and spring from a point anterior to the determination of the particular estates upon which such remainder depends. And the result of such a construction will be, that the use limited to the plaintiff by the will has a capacity of taking effect in either of two ways; namely, either by way of remainder upon the natural determination of the particular estates, or by way of accelerated use antecedent to the determination of such particular estates. In the event which has happened, it takes effect in the latter way, and springs from a point antecedent to the commencement of the estate tail, so that the recovery does not bar it. The circumstance that the recovery bars it, so far as it had a capacity of taking effect subsequently to the estate tail, is no reason why the recovery should bar it so far as it had a capacity of taking effect antecedently to the estate tail.

III. With respect to the defendant's third proposition, it may be admitted, that the proviso is subsequent in the sense that it divests the estate tail after after it has become vested; but that circumstance does not render it subsequent in the sense which is necessary in order that it may be barred by the recovery. The argument now urged for the defendant was attempted in Eales v Conn (a), and failed: Roper v. Hallifax (b) is also a complete answer to it, because, in that case, the power divested the estate tail after it was vested. The proposition is also disproved by the received rule in a case of daily practice. Suppose an estate is limited to several successive tenants for life, A., B., and C., with remainders to the first and other sons of each in tail, and with powers of jointuring and portioning to each tenant for life; the exercise of any one of the powers will defeat the estates tail, after they are vested; but it cannot be contended that a recovery in which A. is tenant to the præcipe, and the first son of C. is vouchee, will bar the powers given to B. The true criterion for determining whether a springing use is precedent or subsequent to the estate tail for the present purpose is, not whether it divests the estate tail, but whether it springs from a point antecedent or subsequent to the estate tail.

IV. The defendant's fourth proposition is sufficiently answered by the original argument of the plaintiff. It is true that in Roper v. Hallifax (b) the intention of the parties to the recovery was different from the intention here. But the discussion of that case turned, principally, not on the intention, but on the power being antecedent to the estate tail.

 LUMLEY
 against
 The Earl of
 SCARBOROUGH.

Lord DENMAN C. J. in this term (May 11th) delivered the judgment of the Court, as follows:—

Upon this special verdict four questions arose:

First, Whether the proviso in the will of Sir George Savile respecting the shifting of his estates in the event of the title of Earl of Scarborough descending upon the possessor of them, applied to any but the first person upon whom it should so descend.

Secondly, If it did, whether the effect of that proviso, in the event of the title descending on a tenant for life, was to let in the son, if any, of the tenant for life until the title should descend on him, or to carry the estates over at once to the next branch of the family.

Thirdly, Whether the recovery suffered in 1812 destroyed the proviso.

Fourthly, Whether the deeds of 1817 barred the lessor of the plaintiff from maintaining this action. Upon the argument, the last of these questions was abandoned by the learned counsel for the defendant, who admitted that the deeds could neither operate by way of conveyance of any interest, nor by way of estoppel.

The first question was material, because, on the descent of the title to the first taker of the estates, they had shifted to the present defendant, and so it was contended that the proviso was satisfied and at an end. This point was not, however, much pressed; and, indeed, it is plainly contrary to the meaning of the proviso, in which, although the words "from time to time" are not inserted, yet the obvious intent is that the proviso should attach to each of the estates created by the will as they should successively vest in possession.

The second question was much laboured in argument, and it was contended that this proviso must be

read and interpreted with reference and by analogy to the proviso as to taking the name and arms of Savile. We think that it is only necessary to read the two provisoes in order to be fully satisfied, that as the motive and object of the devisor was different in the two, so the effect is and was intended to be different also. In the name and arms proviso, the cesser of estate was intended as a personal punishment, by way of forfeiture, against the individual neglecting to comply with it, and the distinction is carefully drawn between tenant for life and tenant in tail; for the estates are to "go to the person (in the singular number) next in remainder in this my will in the same manner as if such person or persons so neglecting or refusing, being tenant or tenants for life, was or were dead, or being tenant or tenants in tail was or were actually dead without issue male." In the provision in question the cesser was not intended as a punishment to the individual, but to prevent the union of the earldom and estates in the same person, and for the benefit of the next branch of the family: accordingly the words used are different, for the estates are to "go to the person and persons who, under the limitations aforesaid, shall then be next in remainder expectant on the decease and failure of issue male of the person to whom the said title shall so descend or come, in the same manner as such person or persons so in remainder as aforesaid would take the same by virtue of this my will, in case he or they to whom the title of the said Earl of Scarborough shall come and fall in possession as aforesaid was or were actually dead without issue." These words, both in the description of what persons in remainder are to take, and of the manner in which they are to take, plainly point out the exclusion of an entire branch of the family, and cannot receive the same construction as the words of the other proviso without doing great violence to the obvious meaning of the devisor, the framers of whose will evidently knew how to express his meaning in appropriate language. It is said that this construction will exclude the younger children of the defendant, who have no present benefit from the earldom. It certainly will exclude them, whether the earldom may descend upon them or not; but this is no reason for putting a sense upon the words of the will which they cannot fairly bear, and it may be observed that to both the provisos the devisor has added a clause protecting all jointures and portions for younger children duly settled before the cesser.

It was said that the clause of cesser is the operative part of the proviso, and the other words cannot carry over a greater interest than that which is made to cease; but we see no reason for saying that the words of cesser are rather the operative words than those by which the estate is carried over; and if the latter are more extensive than the former, there is no authority to prevent them from receiving their full effect.

We are, therefore, clearly of opinion that the effect of the proviso is, on the descent of the title, to carry over the estates at once to the next branch of the family.

We come now to the third question, on the effect of the recovery suffered in 1812 by the defendant, the tenant for life, and his eldest son, the tenant in tail in remainder.

We have no hesitation in holding that this recovery barred and destroyed not only the estate tail and all remainders remainders expectant on the natural failure of that estate; but also that it destroyed the proviso in question so far as it was attached to that estate tail, and all remainders or subsequent estates that were limited to come into possession on the descent of the title upon the defendant's son, or grandson, and so on. The case of Page v. Hayward (a) and other cases abundantly establish this position, which is fully sanctioned by the text writers.

Therefore the recovery undoubtedly barred and destroyed the vested remainder in tail of the present lessor of the plaintiff expectant on the determination of the estate tail vested in the defendant's son, and the conditional limitation to the lessor of the plaintiff in the event of the descent of the title upon the defendant's son: and if the defendant had died in the lifetime of his elder brother, the lessor of the plaintiff would have had no claim whatever in any event.

Neither have we any hesitation in holding that, if no estate had been limited to the lessor of the plaintiff, except such as was to take effect on the happening of the event contemplated by the proviso, so as that such estate would clearly be a new interest then first arising, the recovery would not have barred or destroyed the proviso, so far as it was attached to the life estate of the defendant; and that the lessor of the plaintiff would in the events which have happened be entitled to recover. It does not appear to us necessary to determine to what extent the estate of a recoveror in a common recovery is derived out of the estate tail: it may be admitted that the recoveror cannot take a greater estate than the original donor had, and so that his estate is not derived simply from the estate tail; and it may be admitted that a recovery suffered by tenant in tail of lands ex parte maternâ will or will not alter the course of descent according as the tenant in tail was himself in by purchase or by descent. This, however, is clear, viz., that the estate of the recoveror is not derived out of the estate of the tenant for life, where he is not vouched, as he was not in this case. The conveyance by the tenant for life to make a tenant to the præcipe is no forfeiture of his life estate; it does not determine that life estate; though it may pass it wholly to another, where it is granted without keeping any reversion. This was not done in the present case; the conveyance being to the tenant to the præcipe for the joint lives of himself and the defendant, according to the practice adopted by conveyancers in order more effectually to preserve powers annexed to the life estate. It is a mere matter of form in order to enable the tenant in tail in remainder to bar his estate tail and the remainders over. Any person who has an estate in remainder between a tenant for life and a remote remainder-man in tail, is entitled even after a recovery suffered by them to treat the life estate as still subsisting, and to make his entry on the death of the tenant for life. It is conceded that no such intermediate estates are barred by such a recovery. Why, then, should this proviso attached to the estate for life be barred? It operates, not by way of determining or defeating the estate tail of the defendant's son, but antecedently to that estate by preventing the estate tail from ever vesting in possession, and, being antecedent

to that estate tail, cannot be affected by the recovery. The case of Roper v. Hallifax (a) is an express authority to this effect, which case has been much discussed, but never overruled. See 1 Sanders on Uses and Trusts, pp. 178. 426. and 436. (b) It is argued that that case was decided on the intention of the parties expressed in the deed to lead the uses: but it is quite plain from the language of the judgment that the point as to the recovery and its effect was determined by the Court without reference to the intention of the parties, as indeed in reason and principle it ought to have been; and the intention of the parties was used only in answer to an argument arising upon the effect of the deed itself, which was the second point in the case. The stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 74. s. 15. has been referred to, but it is expressed in general terms, and proves only what in reality is not disputed as a general proposition, viz., that a recovery will not affect estates prior to the estate tail of which it is suffered.

It being then our opinion that the proviso in question, if a new interest arises from the happening of the event contemplated by it, is not barred or destroyed by the recovery, the only remaining point is, whether the limitation to the lessor of the plaintiff of a remainder expectant on the natural termination of the estate tail in the defendant's son, makes any and what difference.

It is argued on the part of the defendant that the proviso, supposing no recovery to have been suffered, and the title of Earl of Scarborough to have descended on the defendant, would have operated only to accelerate and vest in possession that estate of the lessor of the plaintiff which was already vested in him in remainder, and that, as that vested remainder was barred and destroyed by the recovery, it cannot by the happening of any subsequent event revive, be accelerated, and vest in possession. On the other side it is contended, either that it may so revive, or that the proviso would operate so as to create a new interest, and that the lessor of the plaintiff took under the will two interests, one a vested remainder in tail which is barred, the other a mere possibility, which, on the descent of the title upon the defendant, became a new estate tail, and which is not barred.

The words of the will in effect are, that the estate shall go to the lessor of the plaintiff, in the same manner as he would take the same under the will, if the defendant were dead without issue. A condition is added in these words: "such person and persons so in remainder performing and complying with the condition or proviso herein-before contained, for taking and using the surname, and quartering the arms of Savile as aforesaid:" which, it is argued, shows that a new estate was intended to arise; otherwise, why add these words of condition? for, if the old estate only was accelerated, the name and arms proviso was already attached to it. It is answered, that the condition was added for greater caution, and, at all events, cannot alter the legal construction of the will, whatever arguments it may be supposed to furnish as to the opinion of the framer of it. Two reasons are assigned why the Court should hold the proviso to operate by way of acceleration: the one, that otherwise any charge made upon his estate in remainder by the lessor of the plaintiff, prior to the descent of the title on the defendant, fendant, would not remain a charge on the happening of that event, because he would take a new estate; the other, that otherwise, the next person in remainder only would take, and not all others in succession, as would be the case if the remainders were only accelerated. As to the first of these reasons, we do not think that the consequence pointed out, supposing it necessarily to follow, is of sufficient moment to have any influence on the legal construction of the will; and we by no means accede to the construction assumed, though we are not now required to discuss it. As to the second reason, the words of the proviso, "the person and persons next in remainder, &c., and in the same manner as such person or persons, &c.," seem to point at a succession of persons; but if not, still the lessor of the plaintiff may take an estate in tail; and it is not necessary now to determine, whether those in remainder after him can take any thing or not. No authority upon this part of the case was cited at the bar, nor have we been able to discover any. The general intention of the deviser appears to be clear; viz. that his estates should never go in the same line, or to the same persons, as the earldom of Scarborough; and that if any person being tenant for life of his estates should become Earl of Scarborough, the remainder in tail to that person's children should never vest, but the estates should go over as if that remainder in tail had never existed. By holding that a new estate arose in the lessor of the plaintiff on the descent of the title of Earl of Scarborough on the defendant, we are giving effect to that intention so far as we can; and we are not aware that in so doing we are contravening any rule of law: there is no inconsistency in treating the will as giving the lessor of the plaintiff an estate tail vested in remainder, and also a possibility, possibility, to the same person, of a similar, though not the same, estate tail, on the happening of a certain event; the former of which is barred by the recovery, but the latter not. If we were to hold the contrary, this inconsistency would follow; that the defendant, the tenant for life, would hold the estate, together with the title, (a thing quite contrary to the intention of the devisor), by reason of his son having barred the entail; there being no rule of law to compel such a departure from the intention of the devisor. For these reasons we are of opinion, that the lessor of the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed.

DOE on the Demise of THOMAS PHILLIPS, and MARY, his Wife, against MORRIS.

Where a document is proved to have come into the hands of one party to a cause, the opposite party cannot entitle himself to give secondary evidence of its contents by shewing that it has been since lost or destroyed, unless he has served notice to produce.

Defendant in ejectment relied on a will devising all the testator's property except a pecuniary legacy. In answer, plaintiff proved that, after the execution of such will, a document, which he alleged to have been a will, was signed by the testator, and delivered to a woman whom the defendant afterwards married, since which the witness, who prepared it, had heard nothing of it. It was then asked, on behalf of the plaintiff, whether the deceased had declared that paper to be his will, and whether the witness and others had signed it in his presence: Held, that the questions could not be put, no notice having been given to produce the last-mentioned document.

Henry

Henry John, to whom the said Henry John, in April 1819, being then possessed of the premises in question, devised all his property, except a pecuniary legacy to his daughter. Mr. Mortimer, one of the attesting witnesses who proved the execution of this will, was cross-examined by Chilton for the plaintiff, and stated that very shortly afterwards he had prepared another instrument for the testator, who signed it, and that Mortimer witnessed it; that after the testator's death it was delivered to the said Anne John, the testator's widow, and that the witness had never heard her say what she had done with it. No notice had been given to produce this paper. Chilton then proposed to ask whether the testator, on signing the paper, declared it to be his last will, whether the witness signed it afterwards in his presence, and whether any other persons signed it in the presence of the testator; but the questions were objected to, and the learned Judge refused to admit them, observing that the will itself was the best evidence to shew whether or not it had been executed and attested, and that the plaintiff had laid no ground for offering secondary evidence. The defendant had a verdict.

Chilton now moved for a new trial on the grounds of a misdirection (which is not material here), and of the above rejection of evidence. The objection was at all events taken too soon. It is laid down, in the case of a lost deed, that after proof of its due execution the loss of the deed must be proved (a). And the plaintiff in this case not only had a right, but was called upon, to prove in the first place, not indeed the contents of the instrument, but its execution: in other words, that some paper was put into the testator's hands; that he declared it to be his will, and signed it; that others signed it in his presence; and that it subsequently came into the possession of the defendant. After having proved that such an instrument had once been in existence, it would have been for the plaintiff to call for the production of the paper itself, if he had given notice to produce; or to offer evidence (which would have been done here) of the paper having been destroyed. [Lord Denman C. J. How could you talk of the paper as a will at all, if you had not given notice to produce it? Littledale J. The course is, that, before a party can talk of a written instrument, he must call upon the opposite side to produce it, or shew that it was lost and did not come to their hands. Patteson J. The proposed questions could have tended to nothing, unless you had had means of shewing that the paper had been destroyed; and even then, the evidence would not have made out the plaintiff's case, unless the contents of the will could have been shewn.] There would have been evidence to justify the jury in presuming that the contents amounted to a revocation of the previous will; for as the paper supposed to contain that revocation was in existence when the testator died, and would have been proved to have been destroyed by the defendant, this, if the jury thought the evidence sufficient, would have overthrown the defendant's title. In Harwood v. Goodright (a) the jury found specially that the testator, after executing a will, under which the defendant claimed, made another will ; and that the disposition by the latter will was different from that in the preceding one, but in what particulars the jury did not know ; and they did not find that the testator cancelled the previous will, or that the defendant destroyed it, but what was become of the same they were altogether ignorant. In that case it was held that the special verdict did not find any revocation of the first will ; but Lord Mansfield said, that “ in case the defendant had been proved to have destroyed this last will, it would have been a good ground for the jury to find that this was a revocation.” In the present case, evidence would have been offered to shew that the defendant or his wife had destroyed the will. [Patteson J. You assume that both the wills related to the same property. In Harwood v. Goodright (a), it seems by the verdict that the jury must have got at that fact by some legitimate evidence, though in other respects the contents of the will were unknown to them.] As the first will here purported to dispose of all the testator’s property, it must be presumed that the second will made some alteration in that disposition ; and as the defendant or his wife destroyed the second will, the presumption will be taken most strongly against them.

Lord DENMAN C. J. It was proved here that the paper spoken of as the second will was delivered to the testator’s widow. Whatever that paper was, therefore, it is proved to have been in the possession of the adverse party in the cause. It is, consequently, impossible that the rule now moved for should be granted. Before any thing which has been in the hands of the opposite party can be talked of as a will, there must be proof of a notice to him to produce it; for although a witness might be called to say that it had been destroyed, it might be in the hands of the adverse party notwithstanding.

LITLEDALE J. When a document is shewn to have been in the possession of a defendant, the plaintiff is not at liberty to talk of it till he has given notice to produce it; though, if it were shewn that the paper had been lost without coming to the defendant's hands, the case would be different. The supposed will, here, was traced to the defendant; the plaintiff then could not stir without proving notice to produce. Without such proof, even if he had given evidence that the defendant had destroyed the document, he was not entitled to talk of it as a will.

PATTERSON J. To give effect to the second document as a revocation of the previous will, it would have been absolutely necessary to shew that it related to the same subject-matter. When it had been traced to the defendant, no further evidence could be given of it without proving notice to produce. If the plaintiff alleged that the paper had been destroyed after it reached the defendant, he might say, "I dispute that. I have the document, but I will not produce it, because I have not been served with notice." If, indeed, it had been proved that the document was destroyed without having got into the defendant's hands, the case would have been been different. Here the learned Judge stopped the evidence at the point where the will was traced into the hands of the defendant. There is no ground for a rule.

HENSLOW against FAWCETT.

Wednesday,
April 22d.

DEBT for 500*l.*, upon the seventh section (a) of st. 2 G. 2. c. 24. The declaration alleged that, at an election of two burgesses for the borough of Cambridge, the

If A. give money to B. to induce B. to vote for a candidate at an election for a member of parliament, and B. agree to do so in consideration of the gift, A. is liable to the penalty of 500*l.* for corrupting B. to vote, within stat. 2 G. 2. c. 24. s. 7., though B. never gives the vote. A jury may infer the fact of the agreement from circumstances, although B., who is a witness, does not state that he ever intended to vote.

Where, in such a case, A.'s counsel, and the Judge, at the trial of an action against A. for the penalty, put the question merely on the credibility of the evidence, and the jury found against A., the Court refused to grant a new trial on the ground that the Judge should have desired the jury to say, whether B. ever intended to give the vote.

Per Patterson and Coleridge J., if in fact B. never did so intend, A.'s offence was complete by his giving the money for the purpose of inducing B. to vote, and by B.'s professedly accepting it on these terms.

Defendant then said, "You will go and poll for Mr. Knight." Very shortly after this, Garner went to the committee of the two, and only other, candidates, who were standing on an interest opposed to that of Mr. Knight, and told them what had passed, and afterwards voted for those two. These facts were sworn to by Garner, but he did not state what his intention was at the time of his taking the money. The counsel for the defendant called no witness, but endeavoured, in his address to the jury, to shew that the story was improbable, and the principal witness not to be credited. The Lord Chief Baron left the question to the jury entirely on the credibility of the same witness. Verdict for the plaintiff.

HENSLOW
FAWCETT.

Storks Serjt. now moved for a new trial. The Lord Chief Baron should have pointed out to the jury the distinction between attempting to corrupt, and actually corrupting. The former was shewn by the evidence, but not the latter. The offence of attempting to corrupt is no doubt a misdemeanour; but it is not the offence described in the statute, and charged in the declaration. The distinction is shewn by the different expressions used in different parts of the seventh section, as was pointed out in the argument in the Barnstaple case (a). "The legislature have, in the stat. 2 G. 2. c. 24. s. 7. distinctly defined what bribery is,

and in what it consists, both as it relates to a voter, and to a candidate. The voter is guilty of bribery, if he asks, receives, or takes, or agrees or contracts for, any money, &c. to give, or to forbear to give his vote. The candidate is guilty of bribery, if he, by any gift or reward, or by any promise, agreement, or security for any gift or reward, corrupts or procures any person to give, or refuse his vote. In the voter, it is a crime to ask; but the offer on the part of the candidate, which appears to be, as it were, the counterpart of a request by the elector, seems to have been studiously omitted in the second part of the clause; and an actual corruption, or procurement, is made necessary to complete the offence. Therefore, the consent of the voter is essential, for otherwise no person can be said to have been corrupted." And the reason given is, that, upon this construction, 'the voter cannot inform against the candidate without accusing himself also; but that a different interpretation of the act would "leave a candidate, who in the course of his canvass must solicit the votes of a number of electors, at the mercy of any one of them who could be brought to swear, that he accompanied his solicitation with the offer of a bribe," which would be dangerous and unjust. [Coleridge J. Suppose a person to have no right at all to vote, may he not be corrupted? The cases say that he may; Schwyn, N. P. Debt, s. XI. (a)] In those cases an agreement, and an actual voting in pursuance of it, were proved. [Coleridge J. Your argument is much the same as that used for the defendant in Sulston v. Norton (b),

(a) Page 646. (8th ed. 1831,) referring to Rigg v. Curguenen, 2 Wils. 395., and Comb v. Pitt, cited ibid. 398.

where, upon the objection being taken that the person alleged to be corrupted voted for the opponents of the persons for whom he agreed to vote, Lord Mansfield said, that he wondered how it could ever be a doubt; for that the offence was completely committed by the corrupter, whether the other party should afterwards perform his promise or break it.] But in that case, also, there was an agreement. The first part of the section must be taken conjointly with the second, or it must be held that there is no distinction between “asking” in the former, and “corrupting or procuring” in the latter. The language of the statute “corrupt or procure” must be taken as if the words were “corrupt and procure.” At any rate there must be a bonâ fide agreement between the parties. The Court will not be disposed to relax the strictness of proof in an action so highly penal.

HYNLOW

LORD DENMAN C. J. The ground of this motion is, that the judge did not properly leave to the jury a question supposed to arise from the distinction, in the words of the statute, between the offence of the party to whom, and that of the party from whom, the bribe is to come. That distinction is not to the present purpose, except by way of illustration. The act of the party who offers to corrupt is distinct from that of the other party. The offence here charged is corrupting. The statute says, that if any person shall “corrupt or procure” any person to vote or forbear voting, he shall forfeit 500*l*. That is a distinction which fixes the defendant. Procuring is one thing; it is essential that the vote should be given. Corrupting (which word is connected by a disjunctive particle) is another; it seems to me to

lie altogether in the act of the party giving the bribe. It is true that, in Sulston v. Norton (a), notes were exchanged between the parties. But here the consideration for the money was the promise to vote. No doubt it would have been so found, if the question had been expressly left to the jury. The breaking of the contract would not prevent it from having existed as a contract: if we were to hold that it could, we should be confounding all principle. Had there been any real doubt as to the existence of a contract, the defendant's counsel should have called the attention of the judge to that doubt, and have demanded the opinion of the jury upon it. There can be no question which way they would have found, if that had been done.

LITLEDALE J. I think no rule ought to be granted. If there were doubt enough as to the fact of the agreement, the counsel should have required it to be put to the jury; whereas now, for the first time, it is suggested that there is something in the evidence which might have led them to negative that fact. The case, it is true, is different from that of Sulston v. Norton (a), where the transaction was formal and complete at the time. The words of the act are "corrupt or procure;" and it seems to me that these two words mean different things. To procure is to get the thing done; the corruption is completed by effecting an agreement amounting to corruption. If the witness Garner had declared that he merely meant to get the money, and it had appeared clearly that he did mean that only, and not to vote, a question might have arisen; I will not say what the effect of that would have been, nor whether there would or would not be corruption in such a case. But the evidence does not go far enough to raise that question.

PATTESON J. I agree with my brother Storks, that there is a great difference between the two parts of the seventh section of this statute. The first part, which is applicable to the voter, contains the word "ask," which is not repeated in the second. From this it may be taken that, in an action against the party tendering the bribe, proof should be required of more than a mere solicitation. Then, in the first part, the words go on thus, "or agree or contract for any money, &c.;" the agreement, therefore, would subject the voter to the penalty. In the second part, the words are "corrupt or procure;" the question therefore is, whether this defendant has either corrupted or procured. As to procuring, I agree with my lord, that it may be necessary that the vote should be actually given. But as to corrupting, that is not necessary; and so it was held in Sulston v. Norton (a). The corruption is complete without the vote being given. But then my brother Storks says that, if it should appear that the party does not take the money corruptly, his intention being not to give the vote, the penalty does not attach to the party giving the money. And he contends that it does so appear from the facts of this case. But, in the first place, it is not distinctly shewn, here, that Garner did not mean to give the vote. The point was never raised at the trial; and the Judge's attention was not called to it, or he might have put it to the jury. It appears that the Defendant sought the voter out, and gave him money for the purpose of inducing him to vote, and that the other took it. At all events, whether the voter did or did not mean to perform the contract, he professed to enter into it, and took the money given by the defendant for the purpose of corrupting him. In the second place, if he never had such an intention, I should still hold the defendant liable. Whether or not the voter intended to perform his part of the contract is immaterial; the defendant had done all that lay with him. If the agreement was made, that is enough.

COLERIDGE J. It is true that this is a statute highly penal; yet, in construing penal statutes, we must not, by refining, defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. The question here is, as to the meaning of the word "corrupt." My brother Storks argues as if corrupting and procuring to vote, or forbear to vote, were the same thing. Sulston v. Norton (a) distinctly shews that that is not so, and that a person may be guilty of corrupting who has not been guilty of procuring. It is not unimportant to look to other circumstances which are parcel, as it were, of this statutable provision against bribery. Now it has been decided to be immaterial whether the party, to whom the money is given or promised, vote or not, and even whether he have or have not a right to vote. These decisions shew how the courts have been used to interpret the provisions of this statute. It is perhaps never safe to define unnecessarily: but it appears to me, that the offence of corrupting is complete, whenever one party gives or promises money for the purpose of inducing the other to vote or forbear from voting, and that other professedly accepts for that purpose the promise or money so made or given. Thus the offence is complete, by the one giving with such intention, and the other professedly accepting with such intention. He who gives under these circumstances and with this purpose, appears to me to corrupt, and he who accepts, to be corrupted, within the meaning of this act. As respects the defendant in this case, his act was clearly complete. As to the other party, can any one doubt that there had taken place between the two that which, if legal, would have been binding upon him as an agreement? In that case, the defendant would have been safe as a contracting party: the offence is, therefore, in my opinion, complete. I, however, am prepared to go the length of saying that, if it were clearly shewn that Garner never intended to give the vote, concealing the intention from the defendant, and being so far moved by the defendant's act, as to receive his money and conceal such intention, the defendant would still be liable.

Plea, not guilty.

It seemed to be the opinion of the Court in Cypin qui tam v. Carter (1 T. B. 462.), which was an action upon 10 Ann. c. 26. s. 109. (against unlawful lotteries), that not guilty is a good plea on a penal statute; for as it is an action for an offence, the defendant by such a plea says he is not guilty of the offence. In Downton v. Finch (2 Inst. 651.), which was an action of debt upon stat. 2 & 3 Ed. 6. c. 13., for the treble value of tithes, it was held that such action was not an action of debt within the stat. 23 H. 8. c. 15. (giving

The question, however, has not been discussed since the rules of H. T. 4 W. 4. Pleadings in particular actions, II. 2. 4. (5 B. & Ad. viii.). If the plea be sufficient, notwithstanding the new rules, it would seem that all the allegations in the declaration would be put in issue, as neither the rules cited, nor those at IV. 1. ASSUMPSIT for work and labour. The defendant pleaded, among other things, a contract between him and the plaintiff, that if the work was not done, &c. "within a fortnight before the 29th day of September 1834, the plaintiff should not be paid;" and he averred that the work was not done within a fortnight before that day. The replication denied that the doing of the work took place under the said supposed contract. Issue thereon. On the trial before Lord Denman C. J., at the sittings at Westminster after last term, it was proved that the plaintiff had agreed in conversation that he was not to be paid "if the work was not done a fortnight before quarter-day," which was Michaelmas-day 1834. The Lord Chief Justice left to the jury, whether the meaning of the parties was that the work should be completed before the commencement of the fortnight preceding Michaelmas, or during the course of that fortnight; directing them to find, in the former case, for the plaintiff, on the ground of variance, and, in the latter case, for the defendant. Verdict for the plaintiff.

Platt now moved for a new trial. The expression proved means the same thing as the words in the plea. The words of the contract, as set forth in the plea, do not require that the performance of the work should take place during the fortnight, but that it should be actually complete at any time which could be spoken of as being within the fortnight before Michaelmas. The intention was, that on any day during that fortnight the work should be in a state of completion; and the evidence supported that view of the contract.

LORD DENMAN C. J. The defendant has brought the difficulty upon himself by using an expression which is ambiguous at best; but, as it seems to me, the natural and obvious meaning of the agreement proved is that which the jury has given to it; and there is therefore a variance.

LITLEDALE J. According to the common construction of the English language, "within a fortnight before Michaelmas" means, during the period which elapses in the fortnight immediately before Michaelmas. To say that it means, between the time of the expression being used and the commencement of that fortnight, would be inconsistent with the common interpretation of the words. There is therefore a variance.

PATTESON

PATTESON J. I can hardly make sense of the words in the plea; but we are bound, if we can, to give them a meaning. I should say they meant, that the completion was to take place in the course of the fortnight, during the fourteen days.

COLERIDGE J. We do not know enough of the situation of the parties to argue from it as to their meaning. But one can suppose a case in which they may have meant that the work should be completed during the fortnight, or a case in which they might mean it to be finished before the fortnight commenced. That being so, the jury were justified in finding a variance.

EJECTMENT for lands in Northamptonshire. On the trial before Littledale J. at the last Northampton assizes, it appeared that a person of the name of Whitwell was seised in fee of the premises in question, and died so seised in 1774, leaving no issue, but leaving his wife surviving, to whom he devised the premises in fee. In the same year, 1774, the widow married the father of the lessor of the plaintiff, who was the eldest son of this second marriage. The widow had continued in possession of the premises from the death of her first husband to the time of her second marriage, and she and her second husband also continued in possession for some years after the marriage. It appeared that they afterwards removed from the premises, to which they never returned, and came to London, and that they subsequently removed to St. Albans, where they both died, the wife in 1828, and the husband in 1832. No act of ownership or occupation of the premises was proved to have been done by them after their removing to London; the precise time at which this happened was not shewn, nor whether it was within forty years of Mrs. Corbyn's death; but it was clearly more than forty years before the commencement of the action. Evidence was offered on the part of the plaintiff to shew that no fine had been levied by Corbyn the father or his wife, but the learned Judge considered that the action was barred under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 17., and nonsuited the plaintiff, but reserved leave to move to set the nonsuit aside.

Miller now moved accordingly (a). The second section of stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. directs that no action shall be brought but within twenty years after the time at which the right shall have first accrued; and the third section enacts that the right shall be deemed to have first accrued, in the case of a claimant, or the person through whom he claims, being dispossessed, or discontinuing the possession of the land or receipt of the profits, at the time of such dispossession or discontinuance, or at the last time of receiving the profits. The sixteenth section allows to persons who shall be under disability at the time of their right first accruing, as Mrs. Corbyn was during her coverture, ten years from the cessation of the disability; and the seventeenth section provides that, even in the case of such persons, the action must be brought within forty years of the time when the right accrued. Now here forty years had elapsed from Mrs. Corbyn's discontinuance of the receipt of the profits. But the right of the lessor of the plaintiff did not accrue till the death of his father, who was tenant by the courtesy, in 1832. Till then he was a reversioner; the time, therefore, did not begin to run against him till 1832, by the third section. But, further, the fifteenth section gives five years from the passing of the act (24th of June 1833), where the possession, at that time, was not adverse; and there was not, at that time, any adverse possession against the present claimant. Here the Court will presume the possession of the defendant not to be adverse; the husband could not alien alone by stat. 32 H. 8. c. 28. s. 6., nor, even if the wife joined in a feoffment, would that defeat the right of the wife and her heirs to enter upon the husband's death; Co. Lit. 326. a. The wife and her heirs have this right unless there be a fine to which the wife is a party, and here evidence was offered that no such fine was levied. Now, as the Court will always presume the possession of an estate to be legal until the contrary is proved, and as in this case there could be no legal possession except under the title of the lessor of the plaintiff's mother, no fine having been levied by her, the possession of the defendant must be taken to be not an adverse possession; and consequently the lessor of the plaintiff's right of action is not barred before the expiration of five years from the passing of 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J. on a subsequent day in this term (May 4th), delivered the judgment of the Court.

The fact being clear that, within the terms of 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 3., the plaintiff's mother was dispossessed or discontinued the possession or receipt of the rents above forty years before the action brought, the action is clearly barred by section 17. of the same statute. Some argument was raised on the question whether the possession was adverse or not: but the terms of that clause are unequivocal, and one of its objects was to avoid the necessity of inquiring into facts of so ancient a date.

If the persons actually in possession could be shewn to have held under him through whom the plaintiff claims, the possession of the former might be regarded as the possession of the latter: but in this case there was not a single fact from which such an inference could be drawn. On the contrary, the departure of the former possessors to a distance, without appearing to have received any rent or made any demand, is the strongest evidence of their intending to abandon at once all occupation and all claim of ownership. And as the title of the plaintiff's ancestor rested on no documents, but was merely evidenced by possession at an early period, that ancestor's entire desertion of the premises for so long a time goes far to shew a consciousness that the anterior occupation was without title. It is true that if Mrs. Corbyn was the owner, her husband was tenant by the courtesy, and their son's right of possession did not accrue till after his father's death; but this furnishes no answer to the positive enactment of limitation in the seventeenth clause. It is true also that in the cases cited at the bar this Court shewed a strong indisposition to presume a possession adverse, which might be lawful consistently with the facts found: of these cases no more need be said on the present occasion, than that they were not brought within the late statute.

EJECTMENT for premises in Surrey. At the trial before Tindal C. J., at the Spring assizes at Kingston, 1833, the following facts appeared:—The premises were freehold, and consisted of ten acres of land and one or two cottages. The lessor of the plaintiff claimed as heir-at-law of his grandfather, Lazarus Roffey. Lazarus married Sarah Cripps in 1763. He died in 1776, having been for some time previously (but whether before his marriage or not did not distinctly appear), and until his death, in the receipt of the rents. He left his widow, and a son Robert (the father of the lessor of the plaintiff), then twelve years old, surviving him. The widow received the rents for two years afterwards, from the tenant who had held under Lazarus. She then married one Harbrow, and went with him to live upon the premises. The defendant was their son. Mrs. Harbrow survived her second husband, and died in 1830, down to which time she had never ceased residing upon the premises. During her lifetime and that of her son Robert (the father of the lessor of the plaintiff), who died in 1822, she had often said to her son Robert that the premises his life, and from his death until her own, the whole period of such occupation by her being more than fifty years. During her occupation she frequently said that the premises, after her death, belonged to *R. After her death H., then in possession, promised that he would sign an agreement to rent the premises under R. R., but he never did sign it:

belonged to him after her death. She, however, made a will on the 20th of March 1820, by which, describing the premises as having descended to her on the death of her late mother, she devised them in fee to the defendant. On the day after her burial the lessor of the plaintiff called upon the defendant, who then held possession of the premises, and said "do you mean to keep me out of my property?" upon which, after some conversation, the defendant agreed to pay the lessor of the plaintiff two guineas a year rent for the premises, and it was settled that the agreement should be put into writing; this was done, but the defendant refused to sign it. The Lord Chief Justice left it to the Jury as the only point in the case, whether the property in question had belonged to Lazarus Roffey. The plaintiff had a verdict.

Platt now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection. The learned Judge ought to have left it to the jury whether, assuming that the property had belonged to Lazarus, there had not been an adverse possession by the widow for more than twenty years. Supposing that question to have gone to the jury, the verdict was against the evidence. The declarations of Mrs. Harbrow, relied upon for the plaintiff, if uttered before she made her will (and there was no proof to the contrary), are consistent with the subsequent assertion of title by her will. If the property was hers, her son Robert would have been entitled in the event of her making no will. [Parke J. Her declarations were evidence, so far as they made against her own interest; and they shewed that her possession was not adverse. It may be that she was entitled to dower, and that her son allowed her to remain till it should be assigned. At all events she may have held on by his permission. The property was but small.] She had married again when she went there to reside. [Parke J. That might not have put a stop to her son's kindness. *Denman C. INDICTMENT against the parishioners of Whitney,

Herefordshire, for non-repair of a public horse and carriage-way, containing in length 374 yards, &c. The indictment was in the common form, stating that the defendants ought to have repaired, &c. At the trial, before Park J., at the Herefordshire Spring assizes, 1835, the defendants contended that, assuming them to be liable, deduction was at all events to be made in respect of a bridge, and 300 feet of road at each end of it, which lay within the termini specified in the indictment. The fabric which the defendants called a bridge was a stone arch, nine feet wide, built across a mill-stream, and five feet and a half above the water; the date upon it was 1762. It was not proved that the bridge had ever had any parapets; it had none during the time referred to in the indictment; and on this account, surveyors, who were called for the defendants, gave their opinion that it was not a bridge, but a culvert. It also appeared that some years ago the defendants had been indicted for non-repair of the road between the same termini, including the part now in dispute, and had pleaded guilty: and it was contended that this was conclusive against them as to the whole length of road mentioned in the present indictment. These points were discussed before the learned Judge at the trial; and he, after adverting to the opinion delivered by the surveyors, and observing that if there had originally been a parapet, which had been thrown down, the case would have been different, said to the defendant's counsel — "I should say this is a culvert, if you throw it on me to decide. I think that, in fact, a thing of this kind is not a bridge. And it seems to me that you have concluded yourselves upon the former indictment." The question which he left to the jury was, whether or not the road was out of repair. Verdict for the Crown.

If a Judge at Nisi Prius, being pressed to say whether, upon the evidence before him, a particular structure comes within the description of a bridge, gives his opinion on that point, as upon a question of fact, the alleged inaccuracy of such opinion is no ground for moving to set aside the verdict on account of misdirection.

Upon a question, whether a particular structure be a bridge or a culvert, the fact of its being without parapets is not decisive.

Talfourd Serjt. now moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. The question, what constitutes a bridge, is a matter of law, and was so treated in Rex v. The Inhabitants of Oxfordshire (a) by Lord Tenterden, who said that it appeared to turn upon the meaning of "flumen," or "cursus aquæ," the words used in old indictments to denote that over which a bridge is built. And he construed those words as signifying "water flowing in a channel between banks more or less defined." The learned Judge, therefore, in this case, was mistaken in point of law, when he laid down that a structure, built across such a channel, was not a bridge because it wanted parapets. If the jury, under such direction, have found that to be a bridge which is not one in point of law, it is for this Court to rectify the finding. Nor was it correct to say that the defendants had concluded themselves by submitting to the former indictment. It is clearly shewn in 2 Wms. Saund. 159 c. note 10. to Rex v. Stoughton (b), that a submission, or verdict for the Crown, is not always conclusive of liability for the future. The defendants did not contend at the trial that the former judgment was no evidence, but only that it was not conclusive as to the place now in dispute. It was clear that, on the former occasion, the parishioners were liable for some part of the road, and therefore judgment might have gone against them if that part was unrepaired, though they were not liable for the rest. If the structure in question was a bridge, and the parish liable to repair it, they must have been so by prescription; Rex v. Hendon (a); and no prescriptive liability to repair a bridge was charged in the former indictment, or in this.

(b) 5th ed.

The KING
against

Lord DENMAN C. J. I think there is no ground for the motion. If the learned Judge had said that, in point of law, a structure without parapets was no bridge, his ruling would have been quite wrong. But here he was called upon to say whether this building was a bridge or not, and he said, "If you throw it upon me, I say, as a fact, that a thing of this kind is not a bridge;" not putting it as a matter of law, but as his view of the fact with respect to the want of parapets in a building like this which was in question. The want of parapets does not prevent a structure from being a bridge, nor does the mere fact of an arch passing over a stream necessarily make it a bridge. As to the circumstance of the defendants having submitted to a former indictment, that of itself was not conclusive; but the learned Judge appears only to have laid it down as a fact, the consequence of which it was difficult for the defendants to escape from.

LITLEDAL J. The learned Judge did not lay down any proposition of law as to the want of parapets, or the consequences of the former indictment; what he said was merely that, taking the two things together, there was fair ground for saying that the place in question was part of the highway. There ought, therefore, to be no rule.

PATTESON J. I am of the same opinion. I take the decision in Rex v. The Inhabitants of Oxfordshire (a) to be, not that, wherever such a stream exists as is there described, any thing thrown over it is necessarily a bridge; but that there must be such a stream for the structure to be a bridge.

The notices were entered and affixed, according to the rule of court (a), before Hilary term; and the clerk was not aware of any error till the 20th of the present month, when his employers received a letter from Clarke, saying that he had found himself incorrectly described, in the list of applicants for admission, as having been articled to Roberts, whereas he had been articled and served his time to the solicitors whose clerk gave the notices. The clerk now deposed, that the inaccuracy had been entirely owing to his own mistake of the fact, and inadvertence in not making inquiries; and not to any intention on his or Clarke's part to evade the rule of court. Alexander now admitted that there was no reported case in favour of the present application, but stated, on the information

The attorney, in his affidavit, stated the reasons for his not so applying; and further, that the notices were affixed, and entry made, again, at eleven o'clock on the morning of the 29th of May last (third day of this term); and that he therein stated his intention to apply on the 13th of this June, or so soon after as counsel could be heard. Byles now urged that, even in cases where the notice had not been affixed during a whole previous term, the Court had permitted the admission, although the notice had not been affixed till the second day of the term: and that here the indulgence might be extended to one other day, in consequence of the notice having been affixed during the whole of Trinity term last; that the rule had been in substance complied with; and that parties desirous of objecting had in this case had more than the usual opportunity of doing so.

AVERY against CHESLYN.

April 24th.

CASE. The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was seised pur auter vie of a messuage, &c., and that defendant, being his tenant, wrongfully, &c., pulled down, tore down, and removed the cornices of divers to wit ten rooms: Pleas, 1. Not guilty. 2. That the plaintiff was not seised in manner, &c. 3. (Not material). 4.

An allegation, that A. is tenant for the life of M., is supported by proof that A. and B., being joint tenants for the life of M., conveyed their estate by lease and release to A., without an intermediate party.

Issue being joined on an allegation by plaintiff that a cornice was fixed to, and not of right removable from, the freehold, the Judge desired the jury to find for defendant if they considered that the cornice was ornamental merely, fixed during the tenancy, capable of removal without substantial injury to the freehold, and so removed in fact during the tenancy. The jury found for the plaintiff. Held no misdirection.

As

As to pulling down a cornice in one room, that the said cornice was a wooden cornice, and was the property of, and fixed up by the defendant during his tenancy and occupation, at his own expense, with screws only, and for the purpose of ornament; and that the cornice remained so fixed up and merely ornamental till the time next mentioned; and that the defendant, before the end of his tenancy, and whilst in occupation of the premises, at his own expense, carefully and skilfully unscrewed, pulled down, and removed the said cornice, (the same having been from the time when it was so fixed up to the time when it was pulled down and removed, and being at the last-mentioned time, removable by law and of right by the defendant as such tenant); that the defendant did no unnecessary damage, &c.; and that before the end of his tenancy and occupation he, at his own expense, repaired all damage which had arisen from the fixing up and pulling down of the said cornice. Issue was joined on the first three pleas. Replication to the fourth plea, that the said cornice, at the time when, &c., was fixed and plaistered to the wall of the said room, and, before the time when the same was so pulled down and removed, had become, and was at that time, affixed to the freehold of the dwelling-house, and was not, at the time when the same was so pulled down and removed, removable by law and of right by the defendant as such tenant in manner, &c. Issue was joined on this replication. On the trial before Coleridge J. at the last Monmouth assizes, it appeared that the plaintiff and a person named Davies, being seised jointly pur auter vie of the premises, conveyed their estate by lease and release to the plaintiff. Evidence was given as to the the manner in which the cornice was fixed to and removed from the house, and as to its being ornamental or not. The learned Judge was of opinion that the seisin of the plaintiff, as laid in the declaration, was sufficiently proved: but he reserved leave to the defendant to move for a rule to enter a nonsuit upon this point: and he then desired the jury to say whether the cornice was merely a matter of ornament, fixed during the tenancy, capable of removal without doing substantial injury to the freehold, and so removed in fact during the tenancy; and said that, in that case, their verdict should be for the defendant. Verdict for the plaintiff, damages 60*l*.

AVERY
against
CHESLYN.

R. V. Richards now moved for a nonsuit to be entered upon the point reserved, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and also on the ground of excessive damages. First, the conveyance is by two joint tenants pur auter vie to one of themselves, without the intervention of an intermediate party. Unless the Court shall consider this to amount to a release by the one joint tenant to the other, the seisin is not proved as laid. Then as to the cornice, the fact of its being removed without damage ought not to have gone to the jury: that was not a part of the traverse taken in the replication. The plaintiff was entitled to raise the question; but in fact he did not do so on the pleadings. The right to remove, which was the only question on this issue, cannot be impaired by any impropriety in the manner of removing, although such impropriety may be ground for a distinct complaint. In fact the plea alleges that the damage was repaired, and this is not traversed in the replication.

1835. replication. The replication amounts only to an issue of law.

AVERY
against
CHESLYN.

LORD DENMAN C. J. With respect to the point of the seisin, you may consider that the rule is refused, unless we inform you otherwise hereafter (a). It does not appear to me that there was any misdirection. The fact of the removal without damage was put as a test of the way in which the cornice was fixed. It is true that the jury may have misunderstood this, and may have given damages for injury done in the removal; but that goes to the point of excessive damages, or, perhaps, it might be a ground for motion as upon a verdict against evidence.

LITLEDALE J. The direction of the learned Judge appears to me quite correct. It was right to direct the jury to inquire whether the cornice was ornamental, whether it was capable of being removed, and whether it was removed during the tenancy. It was also correct that they should inquire whether it was removable without injury, and was so removed in fact. The jury were not told that, if injury was in fact done, the cornice was not removable.

PATTESON J. It seems to me that there should be no rule as to the issue on the replication to the fourth plea. If it be a mere issue of law, that ought rather to be objected to in arrest of judgment. But it involves fact as well as law; and it seems to amount to an informal issue of fact. It seems to me also, as to the direction, that the fact of the removal without injury was suggested to the jury only as a test of the way in which the cornice was fixed: and it formed a very good test.

The KING against The Inhabitants of St. NICHOLAS, LEICESTER. Saturday, April 25th.

A RULE was obtained in Easter term 1834, calling on the prosecutors in this case to shew cause why the two after-mentioned orders of justices (brought into this court by certiorari) should not be quashed for insufficiency. The orders were as follows:—

“Leicestershire to wit.—To the overseers of the poor of Barrow-upon-Soar in the county of Leicester.

“Whereas Henry Beaumont, of Barrow-upon-Soar aforesaid, who is deemed to be insane, and who hath been wandering about and at large there, hath this day been brought before us, Charles March Phillipps and Charles William Packe, esquires, two of his Majesty’s justices of the peace in and for the said county, pursuant to an order under our hands and seals for that purpose: And

An order of justices upon parish officers, for removing a person of unsound mind (not chargeable) to a house of reception for such persons, under stat 9 G. 4. c. 40. sects. 38. and 44., is good, although it state that the justices have adjudged (and not do adjudge) the settlement of such person to be in the parish of &c.

Such order is correct if it recites that the person is “so far disordered in his senses that it is dangerous for him to be permitted to go abroad,” though the form given by the schedule to stat. 9 G. 4. c. 40., and referred to by sects. 38. and 44. (which provide for the making of such order), speaks only of a person being “lunatic, insane, or a dangerous idiot.”

An order upon the overseers of the parish in which the lunatic is found to be settled, for the expense of his maintenance, &c. at such house of reception, must be prospective only. If it be retrospective in part, such part will be quashed.

thereupon we, the said justices, having called to our assistance Storer Eddowes, surgeon and apothecary, of Loughborough in the said county, and upon examination had of him, the said Henry Beaumont, are satisfied that he is so far disordered in his senses, that it is dangerous for him to be permitted to go abroad, and having made inquiry into the circumstances and place of last legal settlement of him the said *H. where he now remains: We, therefore, the said justices, do hereby order and direct that you, the overseers of the poor of the parish of St. N. aforesaid, the legal settlement of the said H. B., being adjudged to be in your said parish of St. N., do and shall pay the weekly sum of 18s. unto the said Joshua Burgess for the maintenance, medicine, and care of the said H. B. during so long time as the said *H. Signed and sealed by the two justices.

Hildyard now shewed cause. Two objections are taken to these orders. First, that the order of November 1832 contains no adjudication as to the settlement of the insane person. Secondly, that the order of November 1833, for payment of expenses, is partly retrospective. But both are sufficient, according to the statute 9 G. 4. c. 40. ss. 38., 44. SCHEDULE, No. 5.

"Form of Warrant.

"Whereas it appears to us, of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of having called to our assistance a physician, upon the order. Rex v. Maulden (a), where it was assumed that such a statement ought to be made, was decided on a former statute for the care and maintenance of lunatic paupers, 5 G. 4. c. 71., which (by sect. 3.), expressly declared that it should be lawful for two justices "to adjudge the last legal settlement of such lunatic to be in such parish or place" &c. The present statute only enables two justices to make order on the overseer of the parish or place wherein the last legal settlement of the lunatic "shall be adjudged to be," which, construing the words favourably to the validity of the order, may mean only, "shall be found," or "ascertained" to be. And, at all events, the words "we have adjudged" are sufficient; the ordering part, not the determination of the settlement, is the essential part of the document. As to the second order, a direction of payment, retrospectively, is good, for several reasons. By sect. 38. one set of justices may order the lunatic to be conveyed to, and placed in the lunatic asylum or house of reception, and another set may make an order for the expenses of so conveying him, which latter order would, in all probability, be retrospective; more especially as it seems contemplated, that the persons to be charged with the conveyance of such lunatic to the place of reception would be the officers of the parish where he is found, whereas the order for payment may be upon the officers of a different parish, where he proves to be settled. The order to be made is for payment of a weekly or monthly sum to the keeper of the licensed house, &c.; but it is not said that the payment shall be ordered in advance; and if not, the effect of the order would be retrospective. Sect. 42. enacts that, when the settlement of any lunatic confined under an order of two justices shall not have been ascertained at the time of making such order, but shall be discovered afterwards, the justices may order the parish officers of the place of settlement to pay the expenses incurred for twelve months before. That period is the limit, and the only one, to a retrospective order.

Archbold, contra. Sect. 42. is not applicable to the present case. Neither of the orders in question can be sustained under sects. 38. and 44. The effect of the section (44.), under which these orders are made, and which incorporates sect. 38., is merely, as to the weekly or monthly payments, that the justices shall fix a sum, prospectively, to be paid from time to time by the parish for the maintenance and care of the lunatic. [Lord Denman C. J. We are inclined to think you are right as to the retrospective part of the second order.] Then as to the first order. The only power given to the justices by sect. 44. is to proceed as is directed by sect. 38., and that is by making an order in the form given in schedule No. 5. The present order was not in that form. [Coleridge J. Suppose a person is neither lunatic, insane, nor a dangerous idiot, but only, according to sect. 44., "so far disordered in his senses that it is dangerous dangerous for such person to be permitted to go abroad," is the form in the schedule proper?] If the justices find that he is so far disordered, they must make the order as directed by sect. 38. [Coleridge J. The form in the schedule contains no adjudication as to settlement.] The order must either follow the precise form referred to by sect. 38., whether consistent or not with the provisions there made; or it must contain an adjudication, as directed by that section, though not prescribed by the schedule. But the order in question does neither. The justices only say that they "have adjudged." [Lord Denman C. J. It is the same as saying that they adjudge. Littledale J. The words mean that the justices adjudge at that moment. It is like the form of words used in a lease. Patteson J. In Rex v. Maulden (a) the words were only "having adjudged."] Lord Tenterden there said that the inhabitants, by their appeal to the sessions, had treated the order as an order of settlement. [Lord Denman C. J. They could not, by so doing, have made that an adjudication which was not one.]

LORD DENMAN C. J. I think this is quite a plain case, on reference to the act of parliament and to the judgment delivered in Rex v. Maulden (a). The second order, so far as it is retrospective, is not supported by the act, because that provides only for the future maintenance of the lunatic. But as to the other parts of the orders, I see no valid objection. They are made under the forty-fourth section of the act. (His Lordship then read the section.) The justices are directed, in the case there described, to take the course pointed out in sect. 38. That section refers to a schedule, which comprehends three descriptions of persons ; lunatic, insane, and dangerous idiots ; the forty-fourth section adds another description, that of a person “ so far disordered in his senses that it is dangerous for such person to be permitted to go abroad.” The form of warrant given in the schedule does not comprehend this ; but when the forty-fourth section says that, in the case there contemplated, the justices may proceed “ in the same manner as has herein-before been directed in the case of a person chargeable to any parish within the jurisdiction of the said justices,” it must necessarily be taken to introduce the new description of persons into the form to be adopted under that section. And the schedule itself does not say that the description shall be given in every instance precisely according to the form there set out, but only “ as the case may be.” That may extend to such a description as might be given of the persons to be dealt with under the forty-fourth section. The order is good in other respects, so far as it regards future payments.

LITLEDALE J. The first order is made according to the form given in the schedule, except that it states the party to be “ so far disordered in his senses, that it is dangerous for him to be permitted to go abroad.” But the forty-fourth section sufficiently connects the person so spoken of with the description of persons mentioned in the thirty-eighth section, and whose treatment is there provided for. The magistrates state that they have examined the party, and are satisfied of his being “ so far disordered in his senses,” and that, having made inquiry into the circumstances, and the place of settlement, settlement, they have adjudged that the party's settlement is in St. Nicholas, Leicester; they therefore direct him to be removed to the licensed house mentioned in the order. They have, then, in this order, exercised the jurisdiction which they possess under the forty-fourth section, not precisely according to the form given by the schedule, but as much so as the circumstances permitted. The chief difference between the two sects. 38. and 44., is, that the one relates only to persons who are chargeable; the other to any person wandering about and at large within the justice's jurisdiction.

PATTESON J. I am of opinion that so much of the second order as is retrospective must be discharged, but that the first order is good. The objection to the words "have adjudged" is answered by the observations of Lord Tenterden in Rex v. Maulden (a). Here, as in that case, it does not appear that any prior order had been made, and it must therefore be taken that when the justices say they "have adjudged," they then "do adjudge." The form of the order is objected to as not following schedule 5, of 9 G. 4. c. 40.; but, upon comparing the forty-fourth and thirty-eighth sections, it is evident the legislature meant that, in cases under sect. 44. (which relates to persons not chargeable), the justices should proceed according to sect. 38., and that the form of the order should be such as applied to the circumstances of the case; the form given in the schedule not being very accurately penned. If the justices in this order had used the word "insane," I think it would have been good, for the words “so far disordered in his senses,” &c., seem to be used rather as the definition of a degree of insanity than with any other view; and in the same section, immediately afterwards, the justices are directed to inquire into the settlement of “such insane person.” As to the retrospective part of the second order, no substantial distinction has been shewn between this case and Rex v. Maulden (a), where a retrospective order was held not maintainable under the stat. 5 G. 4. c. 71.

COLERIDGE J. I am of the same opinion. The forty-fourth section only directs that the justices shall “proceed” under it “in the same manner” as is directed in the case of a person chargeable to a parish, within sect. 38.: it does not require them to use the particular form referred to there although the circumstances may be different. The form recites that the person is chargeable; that would not apply to a case within the forty-fourth section. The form gives the words “lunatic, insane, or a dangerous idiot;” the forty-fourth section introduces another description, that of persons “so far disordered,” &c. As to the objection that the justices by the first order do not actually adjudge, the order is directed to the officers of the parish where the person is found, not of the parish in which the settlement is declared to be; and, therefore, even if the words “have adjudged” did not bear the meaning assigned to them by the rest of the Court (which I think they do), still, as the act does not say when or where the adjudication shall be made, it would be sufficient, for the purpose of this order, if

EJECTMENT for lands in Lancashire. On the trial before Alderson B. at the Lancaster spring assizes 1834, the following facts appeared: — Francis Carter, being seised in fee of the lands in question, on the 3d of October 1821 demised them for 1000 years to William Rowlands to secure 150*l.* and interest, with a power of sale to Rowlands. By indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 23d and 24th of January 1823 (after stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117. came into operation), the release being between Rowlands of the first part, Carter of the second, William Worsley of the third, and William Bartley of the fourth, reciting the previous mortgage, Rowlands, in consideration of 152*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*, the principal and interest, paid to him by Worsley, assigned the term of 1000 years to Bartley; and Carter, in consideration of the premises, and of 197*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* paid to him by Worsley, demised the lands to Bartley for the remainder of the term. The trusts of the grants by Rowlands and Carter were de-

C. being seised in fee, granted to R. a term of 1000 years as security for a loan of 150*l.* After st. 3 G. 4. c. 117. came into operation, R., in consideration of W.'s paying him 150*l.*, and C., in consideration of the premises, and of W.'s advancing 200*l.* additional to C., assigned, by the same deed, the term to a trustee for W., to secure the 350*l.*; and C., by the same deed, released the fee and the reversion to W., to secure the same 350*l.*

Held, that this deed was not liable to stamp duty as a transfer, nor to a progressive duty of 1*l.* 5*s.* on every 1080 words after the first 1080, but was liable under the above statute and st. 55 G. 3. c. 184. sched. part 1., Mortgage, to an ad valorem duty (2*l.*) on the 200*l.*, and a progressive duty of 1*l.*: And that it was not liable to stamp duty as a fresh mortgage for 350*l.* by reason of the conveyance of the fee.

clared to be for Worsley, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, to secure the 350*l.* with interest, and in the mean time in trust for Carter, his heirs and assigns, to attend the inheritance; and, by the same deed, Carter, for the considerations aforesaid, granted, bargained, sold, aliened, released, and confirmed the premises and the reversion therein to Worsley in fee, in trust to sell, and raise the 350*l.* Worsley died intestate in 1833, and Harter, Barbour, and Evans were his administrators. On the production of the indenture of release, of the 24th of January 1823, it was found to contain four skins of 1080 words; on the first there was a stamp of 1*l.* 15*s.*, on the second a stamp of 2*l.*, on the third a stamp of 2*l.*, on the fourth a stamp of 1*l.*; in all 6*l.* 15*s.* The counsel for the defendant objected to the admission of this deed, on the ground that the stamps were insufficient; but the learned Judge received it, giving leave to move for a nonsuit, and the plaintiff had a verdict. In Easter term 1834 Crompton obtained a rule nisi for a nonsuit.

Cresswell, Sir W. W. Follett, and S. Martin, now shewed cause (a). By stat. 55 G. 3. c. 184. sched. part 1., Mortgage, an original mortgage for 350*l.* would require a stamp of 4*l.* and a progressive duty of 1*l.* for each of the last three skins, in all 7*l.* In the same schedule, Mortgage, every transfer of a mortgage, "provided no further sum of money or stock be added to the principal money or stock already secured," is subjected to a stamp of 1*l.* 15*s.* But the proviso takes the present case out of this enactment, as an additional 200*l.*

was secured on the transfer. The following clause in the schedule therefore would apply; viz. "and in all other cases such transfer or assignment, disposition or assignation, shall be charged with the same duty or duties as an original mortgage," &c. So that, under that statute, the stamps here required would amount to 7*l*. But the stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117. s. 1. repeals the ad valorem duties and other duties imposed by the previous acts on any transfer, assignment, disposition, assignation, or reconveyance of any mortgage. And sect. 2. charges (a) the transfer, if no further money be secured, with a duty of 1*l*. 15*s*. for the first 1080 words, and (where the instrument contains 2160,) a progressive duty of 1*l*. 5*s*. for every additional 1080. Then follows a provision under which the present case falls, and which enacts that, if any additional sum be secured, the ad valorem duty on mortgages payable under the former act shall be charged only in respect of the additional sum. Here, therefore, the stamp is to be paid as if there were simply a mortgage of 200*l*. under 55 G. 3. c. 184.; that is, 2*l*. for the ad valorem duty, with 3*l.* more for the progressive duty. On the other side, however, it is contended that the present case falls under both clauses of 3 G. 4. c. 117. s. 2., and that there ought to be a transfer duty of 1*l.* 15*s.*, with three additions of 1*l.* 5*s.* for the progressive duty on a transfer, besides the ad valorem duty of 2*l.* on the 200*l.*; that is, 7*l.* 10*s.* If that were a correct construction, the stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117., instead of relieving parties, as was intended, from being charged twice over with an ad valorem duty on the same sum, would really increase the charge in all cases where the whole sum did not exceed 500*l.*, since, for all sums not exceeding 500*l.*, the old charge would have been at the utmost 4*l.* ad valorem duty, with 3*l.* for progressive duty; but, for larger sums, 5*l.* and upwards, with 3*l.* progressive duty. The legislature cannot have intended to benefit parties in one case and not in the other. Besides, under stat. 55 G. 3. c. 184., the progressive duty was not charged on the transfer, but on the mortgage: but now, though the stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117. s. 2. connects the progressive duty with the transfer in cases only where no further sum is advanced, it is attempted to treat this as a transfer of the latter description, for the purposes of the transfer duty and the progressive duty, and as a mortgage, for the purpose of the ad valorem duty. If the statute be not explicit, the main transaction should be that on which the progressive duty is charged; and that is, in the present case, not the transfer of the security for 150*l.*, but the fresh advance of 200*l.* As to the transfer or deed stamp of 1*l.* 15*s.*, the ad valorem duty, and the deed duty, are never found to be charged at the same time. This stamp of 1*l.* 15*s.*, which is actually on the deed, was in fact unnecessary. It will be said that the plaintiff's plaintiff's construction will lead to an absurdity, inasmuch as, if the additional sum advanced be not above 100*l.*, there will be a duty of 1*l.* 10*s.* only, ad valorem, and 3*l.* progressive duty, whereas a mere transfer of a mortgage for 100*l.* would require a duty of 1*l.* 15*s.* for transfer duty, and 3*l.* 15*s.* progressive duty. But such an anomaly is no reason for distorting an act of parliament from its obvious interpretation; and the construction contended for on the other side introduces greater inconsistencies with the intention of stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117. It will also be contended that the conveyance by Carter of the reversion in fee to Worsley makes this in effect a new mortgage for the whole 350*l.* But the substantial effect of the transaction is only to make the same land a security for an additional 200*l.*; and the stamp acts relate, not to the magnitude of the security, but to that of the sum secured. Besides, one of the exemptions, in stat. 55 G. 3. c. 184., from the ad valorem duty on mortgages, comprehends this case (a).

Crompton, contra. First, this is an original mortgage of the fee simple for 350*l.*, the fee not having been mortgaged at all by the previous deed: there should, therefore, have been an ad valorem stamp of 4*l.* and 3*l.* progressive duty. Otherwise, the original 150*l.* will be secured on the fee without any duty. It is as much a fresh mortgage for all the 350*l.*, as if additional land had been mortgaged. It is in fact a mortgage of the whole fee, subject to the incumbrance created by the old debt. If the original demise had been for one year only, could it have been said that the conveyance of the fee operated only as a transfer of the term of one year? The exemption in stat. 55 G. 3. c. 184. sched. part 1. Mortgage (a), expressly excludes cases where further sums are advanced; and, as to the case where a fresh estate is subjected to the incumbrance, no provision is made: that case is purposely left on the footing of an original transaction. So stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117., which repeals the former act as to transfers, still leaves the case of the conveyance of a fresh estate on its former footing. And, again, in stat. 55 G. 3. c. 184., schedule, part 1., Mortgage, after the imposition of the transfer duty, it is said, "and in all other cases such transfer or assignment, disposition or assignation, shall be charged with the same duty or duties as an original mortgage," &c. But, secondly, if this be a transfer only, the transfer duty of 1*l.* 15*s.* and the progressive duty of 3*l.* 15*s.* should be charged, besides the ad valorem duty of 2*l.*, which stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117. s. 2. adds to the former, in cases where additional sums are secured upon the transfer. If there be any doubt, the burden of the argument lies upon those who insist upon the later statute as taking the case out of the operation of the earlier one. It is said that the intention of stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117. was to relieve the transfer from the heavy duty; but the hardship which it was intended to remedy, was, not the duty on the transfer, but the repetition of the ad valorem duty. Therefore, while the new ad valorem duty is confined to the sum newly secured, the transfer duty is imposed at a fixed charge; and it is not surprising that, in such a case, the legislature should, on the other hand, have increased the progressive duty. The argument on the other side compels the plaintiff to contend that the 1*l*. 15*s*. transfer stamp, which has been actually put on, was unnecessary. The deed consists of two parts, a transfer of the old security, and an additional security created for the new advance. And unless the progressive duty be referred to the transfer, stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117. s. 2. gives no progressive duty at all: it repeals the previous enactment as to transfers, and refers to stat. 55 G. 3. c. 184. only for the ad valorem duty, which cannot be construed to comprehend the progressive duty; and in all other cases the progressive duties are expressly mentioned. [Littledale J. That is not exactly so, in the third section of stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117.] The fallacy on the other side is in supposing that the two cases, contemplated in the second section of stat. 3 G. 4. c. 117., are incapable of co-existing: the natural construction is, that the transfer duty of 1*l*. 15*s*. and the progressive duty of 1*l*. 5*s*. are to be charged if there be no further sum secured; and if there be a further sum secured, then also the ad valorem duty on that. [Patteson J. If so, one would rather have expected the language to specify, more precisely, a charge of 1*l*. 15*s*. in all cases, with the progressive duty; and no more than that, if there there were no additional sum secured ; but an additional ad valorem duty for any additional sum.] In general, under the stamp acts, when there is a general deed stamp, or an assignment stamp of 1*l.* 15*s.*, the progressive duty is 1*l.* 5*s.*; if, therefore, as the defendant contends, the assignment stamp of 1*l.* 15*s.*, which is here used, was necessary, it should seem to follow that the progressive duty ought to be 1*l.* 5*s.*, and the 1*l.* progressive duty seems more applicable to a case of a mere mortgage, not being an assignment.

In this term, May 9th,

Lord DENMAN C. J. delivered the judgment of the Court. After recapitulating the facts, his Lordship proceeded as follows :— The question was, whether these stamps were sufficient, and we think that they are. The deeds operate doubly ; viz. by transfer of the original mortgage, and by conveyance of the fee as a further security.

As regards the transfer, the stat. 55 G. 3. c. 184. sched. part 1., title Mortgage, treats a transfer, where a further sum of money is added, as an original mortgage, and imposes a transfer duty of 1*l.* 15*s.* only in cases, “ provided no further sum of money be added to the principal money already secured,” and here a further sum was added. The stamps, therefore, would have been, under that act, a 4*l.* ad valorem stamp and three progressive stamps of 1*l.* each, exceeding the stamps actually used by 5*s.*

But the statute 3 G. 4. c. 117. s. 1. repeals stat. 55 G. 3. c. 184., so far as regards the duties on transfers of mortgages, and enacts, by section 2., that in case of a transfer, “ provided no further sum of money ” “ be added to the principal money" "already secured," there shall be paid 1*l.* 15*s.*, and a progressive stamp duty of 1*l.* 5*s.*; "and if any further sum of money" "shall be added to the principal money" "already secured, the ad valorem duty on mortgages, payable under the said recited acts respectively, shall be charged only in respect of such further money." It is observable that by this act the transfer duty of 1*l.* 15*s.* is imposed with the same proviso as was contained in stat. 55 G. 3. c. 184., and we think that the effect is the same, viz., that the transfer duty is imposed in those cases only where no further sum of money is added. Here a further sum is added, and therefore the transfer duty is out of the question. The other part of the section requires an ad valorem duty on the sum added; and we think that the effect of that part of the clause is to make this transfer, as regards stamp duties, an original mortgage for securing 200*l.*; and that the ad valorem stamp duty of 2*l.* is charged upon it by the 55 G. 3. c. 184. It follows that the progressive duty is three sums of 1*l.* each: those stamps are actually on the deeds in question.

But it is said that this is an original mortgage by reason of the conveyance of the fee.

The third section of 3 G. 4. c. 117. does not apply to these deeds; for it is confined to cases where the original instrument on which the ad valorem duty was paid was a bond: here it was an indenture. This part of the question therefore turns on the exemption clause in 55 G. 3. c. 184.

That clause exempts from the ad valorem duty, but not from any other, any deed made as additional or further security for any sum of money already secured by a deed which shall have paid the ad valorem duty, in case such further security shall be made by the same person who made the original security; but, if any further sum be added, the ad valorem duty shall be charged in respect of such further sum. Here the person conveying the fee is the same person who created the term, and a further sum is added. Therefore, if the deed had been simply a conveyance of the fee, and had not contained a transfer of the term, the duty would have been 2*l.* ad valorem, on account of the additional 200*l.*, and three progressive duties of 1*l.* each. Whether a common deed stamp also was necessary under either of the acts it is not material to enquire, because the 1*l.* 15*s.* stamp erroneously put on these deeds is sufficient to cover that stamp, if necessary. But, as the deeds in question do contain a transfer of the original mortgage, it is plain that before the passing of 3 G. 4. c. 117. the exemption clause in 55 G. 3. c. 184. would not have applied, and on the whole this must have been treated as a new and original mortgage liable to the ad valorem duty of 4*l.* The act of 3 G. 4. c. 117. has however repealed that part of the 55 G. 3. c. 184., and substituted the same ad valorem duty of 2*l.* on the transfer in respect of the additional sum, as the exemption clause had already charged on the new security in respect of the additional sum; and as the ad valorem duty depends on the sum secured, and not on the value or number of the securities, and is only to be paid once, it follows that the case is the same in effect as if the ad valorem duty of 2*l.* had been charged on the transfer, and afterwards the fee had been conveyed as a further security for the whole sum of 350*l.*, in which case a common deed stamp only would have been required.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the stamps are sufficient, and that the rule for a nonsuit must be discharged.

DEBT for money had and received, and on an account stated. Plea, nil debet. On the trial before Patteson J., at the Worcester Spring assizes 1834, it appeared that the defendant was mortgagee in possession of a house and farm, upon certain trusts, under a deed of settlement; and that, in execution of those trusts, he received the rents and profits, of which he applied part to the repairs, insurance, land-tax, and other necessary expences, and paid, half-yearly, 50*l.* to the plaintiff's wife, and the rest to the plaintiff. The clerk of a bank at which the defendant had several times made payments

Defendant held land in trust to receive the rents and pay 50*l.* half-yearly to plaintiff's wife, and the residue, deducting for repairs, land-tax, &c. to plaintiff. Defendant left word for plaintiff at a bank, where he had been accustomed to pay in such residue to plaintiff's use, that he would pay plaintiff 10*l.* on his giving defendant a receipt for 27*l.*; plaintiff did not offer the receipt, and the 10*l.* not being paid, he sued defendant for it as money had and received, and on an account stated. Defendant offered to prove that, at the time of his proposal to pay 10*l.*, he had laid out more than 27*l.* in repairs, but the evidence was rejected. Plaintiff having obtained a verdict for 10*l.*, and defendant moving to enter a nonsuit:

Held that, upon the evidence, defendant might be taken to have admitted a balance of 10*l.* in his hands to plaintiff's use; and if so, that he could not, in defence, either set up his character of trustee, or offer evidence to shew that the balance did not exist.

on the above account to the plaintiff's use, stated as follows : — " In the early part of November I proposed to pay the plaintiff between 10*l.* and 12*l.*, on his giving me a receipt for 27*l.* I was directed to do this by the defendant." The clerk had, on former occasions, taken receipts from the plaintiff for such payments, and handed them to the defendant. The tenant also stated that, after he paid the defendant his last Michaelmas rent, the latter said that he should pay the plaintiff money (not saying how much), if he chose to have it, though he, the defendant, had laid out more in repairs. It did not appear that the plaintiff offered any receipt, and the 10*l.* was not paid him. The counsel for the defendant urged that he, being a trustee, was not liable at law for the 10*l.*; and they also proposed to give evidence of repairs done to an amount exceeding 27*l.*, and to which the sum now demanded was applicable. The learned Judge thought that the payment into the bank, with the direction proved to have been given to the clerk, precluded the defendant from insisting on his character of trustee, or from offering evidence of repairs in reduction of the plaintiff's demand. He gave leave, however, to move to enter a nonsuit, and the plaintiff had a verdict for 10*l.* A rule nisi was obtained for entering a nonsuit, in Easter term 1834.

Ludlow Serjt. and Godson now shewed cause. The defendant having received this money, and acknowledged that he had it ready to pay over, and having actually directed the banker's clerk to pay it on his behalf to the plaintiff, cannot now deny that he has received it to the plaintiff's use, or send the plaintiff into a court of equity to recover it against him as trustee. It is true, the offer to pay was accompanied by the demand of a receipt, but the evidence clearly shewed that the defendant's duty, as trustee, was at an end as to the particular sum, and that he held himself accountable for it to the plaintiff.

R. V. Richards, contra. The rule is, that a balance of money received, and to be accounted for, by a trustee, cannot be sued for at law by the party entitled, unless such balance has been specifically adjusted, in which case it may become the subject of a count for money had and received, or upon an account stated; Case v. Roberts (a). [Lord Denman C. J. The law is clear; if this was an open account, it was a trust account.] The whole effect of the evidence was that, at the time in question, the defendant said that he was willing to pay the plaintiff 10*l.* if he would give him a receipt for 27*l.*; that did not shew that the defendant actually had a balance of 10*l.* ready to pay over. To make it clear that he had not such a balance, he could have proved that he had laid out the sums of 10*l.* and 17*l.* in repairs; and that evidence should have been admitted. The meaning of the defendant's language was: — "I am willing to pay this party some money; he cannot claim any, but I am ready to accommodate him. If, however, he stands upon his right, I can shew that I have paid more for repairs than any sum he can claim."

LORD DENMAN C. J. The defendant, as trustee of this property, was bound to pay out of the half-yearly rent 50*l.* to the plaintiff's wife, and the residue (after making the necessary deductions) to the plaintiff. He says to a witness, "I am willing to pay the husband 10*l.*, if he will give me credit for repairs by a receipt for 27*l.*" A difficulty seems to have been raised as to that, and the payment was not made. Then the question is, whether this 10*l.* was such a balance as could be recovered in the present action? It appears to me that the defendant has stated his account for himself. The question of fact was, what the defendant's intention was in expressing himself as he did. What the real state of the account may have been is immaterial. The rule must be discharged.

LITLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion. The defendant, by what he said, admitted that he had 10*l.* in hand, and appropriated it to the plaintiff's use. He cannot then avail himself of his character of trustee.

COLERIDGE J. concurred.

PATTESON J. If the message given through the clerk had been, "Mr. Holland is willing to let you have 10*l.*, but you have no right to it," the case would have been different.

ASSUMPSIT on the warranty of a horse. There were special counts on the contract, and indebitatus counts for the value of the horse. On the trial before Park J. at the Hereford Spring assizes, 1834, it appeared that, in November 1832, the plaintiff bought the horse, warranted sound, of the defendant, who was a grocer: that the horse, when bought, was in bad condition, and required physic: that after the expiration of two months he was tried in a carriage, and found unfit for work; a farrier was then sent for, and various remedies administered for three months. The horse was found to be paralysed in the spine, and it was not disputed, in argument on the motion for a new trial, that this unsoundness existed at the time of the sale. In July 1833, the plaintiff sent a message to the defendant, informing him that the horse was unsound, enquiring what the defendant wished the plaintiff to do, and stating that the plaintiff would send the horse back. The defendant refused to take him. No reason was given (except by the above evidence) for the delay in applying to the defendant, and it appeared that, between the time of the purchase and that of sending the message, the plaintiff had frequently passed the defendant's house, but had not called there. The learned Judge was of opinion that the plaintiff, in order to insist upon the breach of warranty, ought to have returned the horse at the earliest opportunity after discovering the unsoundness; more especially as the defendant, from the nature of his business, was probably unacquainted with horses: and that the horse had been detained for a time which was clearly unreasonable under the circumstances. He therefore directed a nonsuit. Ludlow Serjt. in Easter term 1834 (April 17th) moved for a new trial, and referred to Fielder v. Starkin (a), and Caswell v. Coare (b). [Parke J. Blay* (c), the purchaser of a specific chattel, having accepted it, not only is not bound to return it on a failure of warranty, but cannot do so.] A rule nisi having been granted,

F. V. Lee now shewed cause. The question is, whether Fielder v. Starkin (a) is not overruled, or at least qualified, by subsequent cases. Lord Loughborough there held that, if a horse sold with warranty of soundness be proved to have been unsound at the time of sale, it is not necessary, for maintaining an action on the warranty, that he should be returned to the seller. But in Adam v. Richards (d) the Court of Common Pleas said that, "where there was an agreement to take a horse back, if on trial he should be found faulty, though it were accompanied with an express warranty, it was incumbent on the purchaser to return the horse as soon as the faults were discovered." That qualifies the proposition laid down by Lord Loughborough, in Fielder v. Starkin (a), that "no length of time elapsed after the sale will alter the nature of a contract originally false." There is not, for the present purpose, any essential distinction between a warranty with an agreement to take the horse back if found faulty, and a warranty without such agreement. In each case there ought to be a return in reasonable time. In Street v. Blay (a) Parke J. says, "According to the general rules on the subject of warranty, a vendee is bound to return the article as soon as he discovers the unsoundness." [Lord Denman C. J. That is in cases where he is bound to return it.] The present case comes within the principle of those in which it has been held, that a purchaser of goods under a contract that they shall be of a particular description cannot reject them, if he has disposed of them as his own, or detained them more than a reasonable time; Parker v. Palmer (b), Okell v. Smith (c). [Lord Denman C. J. Is it not for a jury to say what is a reasonable time under the circumstances of the case?] There may be so clear a case that the judge ought not to leave it to the jury. In Hunt v. Silk (d) it is said, that where a contract is to be rescinded, it must be rescinded altogether, "and the parties put in statu quo." Here the plaintiff, by returning the horse at the time when he offered to do so, could not have put the seller in as good a situation as he was in at the time of the sale.

Ludlow Serjt. and R. V. Richards, contra. In Gompertz v. Denton (e) the doctrine of Street v. Blay (g), as to the rejection of articles purchased, on a failure of warranty, was recognized by the Court of Exchequer; and Bayley B., adverting to the latter case, said, it is "there laid down, that a purchaser has no right to return the article, unless there has been a condition in

PHILPOTT against ELIZABETH KELLEY.

To an action of TROVER for port wine, bottles, casks, &c. Pleas :
trover for wine, commenced, October 1833, the statute of limitations was pleaded. The wine, in pipe, had been deposited by C. for the plaintiff, in the defendant's cellar, by her leave. C. became bankrupt, and, his assignees claiming the wine, the plaintiff's solicitors warned the defendant, by letter, in December 1826, not to give it up to any person unauthorised by them. The defendant kept the wine, and bottled part of it at, or soon after, the end of 1826, at which time it was becoming injured by remaining in the wood. Afterwards, but it did not appear when, she consumed part of the wine so bottled. In November 1827, the plaintiff's solicitors again wrote to the defendant, saying that they were instructed to proceed at law against her, and referring to a demand of the wine, stated in the letter to have been made upon her by them in the preceding March, but of which there was no further evidence. They also offered to indemnify her against the claim of any other person, if she would deliver the wine within a week ; in default of which they stated that the proceedings would be commenced. The application was not noticed. A subsequent demand and refusal were proved. The jury having found for the plaintiff :

Held, on motion to enter a nonsuit, that on this evidence the jury were not bound to conclude either that there had been a demand and refusal more than six years before action brought : or that the defendant had bottled the wine with intent to convert it to her own use.

Semble, by Patteson and Coleridge Js., that if a bailee of wine draws off and converts part of it without the owner's knowledge, and at the end of six years is sued in trover for the whole quantity, he cannot set up his conversion of part as a conversion of the whole, to support a plea of the Statute of Limitations.

law of the defendant, was called on behalf of the plaintiff, and stated that in 1825 he took charge of a pipe of port wine for the plaintiff, to whom it belonged, and placed it in the defendant's cellar by her leave. Some proof was given that he at that time asked her to take part of it on her own account. It appeared further, that, in November 1826, a commission of bankrupt issued against Croasdill, founded on acts of bankruptcy committed during that year, and an assignment was executed on the 6th of December 1826. Before Christmas the wine was claimed of the defendant by the assignees, but she refused to deliver it. Messrs. Brooks and Co., solicitors for the plaintiff, wrote the following letter to the defendant, dated the 26th December 1826:

“Madam,—We are informed by Mr. Philpott that a pipe of port wine, purchased and paid for by him, and in your custody, has been applied for under the pretence that it belongs to the assignees of Croasdill, who has been declared a bankrupt. We, therefore, as solicitors for Mr. Philpott, give you notice not to part with the same to any one but such person as shall be duly authorised to receive the same by Mr. Philpott, or by us as his solicitors.”

The defendant did not give up the wine, and in December 1826, or January 1827 (more than six years before this action was commenced) she bottled part of it, which she afterwards used, but at what time did not appear. The wine was then becoming deteriorated by remaining in the wood. On the 22d of November 1827, Messrs. Brooks and Co. wrote to the defendant as follows:—

nience was placed in your cellar, and was demanded of you so long ago as the 12th of March last; but as Mr. Philpott has no wish to put you to any unnecessary inconvenience or expence, we have to propose to you, that in case you will deliver up the same to him within a week from the present time, he will indemnify you against any claim that might hereafter be set up by any other person to the same; and as the matter cannot be allowed to remain any longer unsettled, we shall commence proceedings against you without further notice, unless the same is delivered within the time above stated."

This application was not attended to. In April 1833 the plaintiff formally demanded the wine of the defendant, with the consent of the assignees, but it was not given up. The present action was commenced on the 18th of October 1833. The letters, and the bottling and consumption of the wine were proved at the trial by the defendant, who contended, that a cause of action had accrued more than six years before the commencement of the suit; for that, in the first place, the bottling of the wine was a conversion; and, secondly, the letters shewed a demand and refusal more than six years before October 1833. The Lord Chief Baron left the case to the jury, reserving leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, if the Court should think that the facts proved entitled her to it: and the plaintiff had a verdict. A rule nisi was obtained, in the next term, for entering a nonsuit, against which Spankie Serjt., and Channell now shewed cause. There was a clear demand and refusal in April 1833, but the answer attempted is, first, that there had already been a demand and refusal, and that more than six years before before the commencement of the action. But in December 1826, when Messrs. Brooks and Co. wrote their first letter, the assignees had at least a probable claim to the wine, and the letter then written was not a demand, but only a notice not to part with the property to any person not authorised by the plaintiff. Non-delivery of the wine, upon such a letter, could not be evidence of a conversion. The letter of November 1827 was within the six years; but it is relied upon as shewing a previous demand and refusal. Supposing, however, that the letter did shew some previous demand, there is no evidence what its nature was, nor of the circumstances which followed. It does not appear that the wine was ever sent for, and the defendant was not bound to send it. She may never have refused to deliver it; but may have kept it merely in order to make the necessary enquiries. To shew a conversion, there must be such a refusal as implies an independent assertion of property in the person refusing; not that qualified denial which merely operates in delay of the claim. Instances of the latter kind are given in 2 Starkie on Evidence, p. 843., 2d ed. Then, secondly, it is said that there was an actual conversion by the bottling, followed by consumption, of the wine. But it does not appear when the wine was drunk; and there is no ground to assume that the bottling was done as an act of ownership. It may have been necessary for the preservation of the wine. And it was an act done without the knowledge of the plaintiff. It is true that the plaintiff's want of knowledge has been held to make no difference in an action of trover, to which the statute was pleaded; Granger v. George (a); but that has been in the absence of fraud.

It was admitted by Lord Mansfield, in Bree v. Holbeck (a), that there may be cases which fraud will take out of the Statute of Limitations: and the courts, in deciding subsequent cases, have not interfered with that position. [Patteson J. Although there may have been fraud in the act done by a defendant, is that sufficient unless there was fraud used to prevent the plaintiff's earlier knowledge of the act? Howell v. Young (b). Coleridge J. In Brown v. Howard (c), Dallas C. J. seems to consider that fraud in the act itself would be sufficient.]

Thesiger and Platt, contra. The letter of November 1827, and the defendant's omission to answer it, joined to the fact of her having previously bottled off a part of the wine, were evidence of a conversion by her more than six years before action brought. Any claim on the part of the assignees to which she might have paid attention was disposed of by the letter of December 1826; and then the letter of November 1827 shews that there had been a previous demand of the wine on the plaintiff's behalf, and that, at the time of that demand, the defendant was refusing to give it up. It is not necessary to a case of conversion, that there should be direct proof of a demand and refusal; circumstances may raise a presumption of them; Topham v. Braddick (d), Watkins v. Woolley. (e) [Patteson J. Are we to presume a refusal in favour of a person who sets up her own wrongful act? The offer of indemnity shews that the refusal, if there had been one, had been qualified by reference to the supposed right of the assignees; and if there were conflicting claims, such a refusal to deliver to either party was not proof of a conversion (a). Was it to be presumed that, between the letter of 1826 and the letter containing the offer to indemnify, there had been a positive refusal? The threat of legal proceedings in the last letter implies such a refusal. But, further, the bottling of part of the wine was a conversion. It is said that that was done to preserve it. But if a perishable article is deposited for safe custody, it is not clear that the bailee has a right, for the sake of any supposed benefit to the commodity, to exercise such an act of ownership as this, which even affects the evidence of title. And it is a reasonable question here, whether or not the intent was preservation. The drinking of the wine afterwards is strong evidence that the intention in bottling was to convert it. [Lord Denman C. J. That was for the jury, and they have found otherwise. As to the bottling, it was the treatment to which the wine was entitled, in whosoever hands it was. Littledale J. I should not have concluded that the bottling shewed an intention to convert, considering the perishable nature of the commodity. Patteson J. It is consistent with the evidence, that it may have been done by consent of all the parties claiming.] In Richardson v. Atkinson (b) it was held, that drawing off part of the liquor was a conversion of the whole. [Patteson J. There the defendant filled up the vessel with water. It cannot be contended, that if a bailee draws off part of a butt of wine, a perfect cause of action arises in respect of the whole. Such a constructive conversion is monstrous. And at all events the wrongdoer cannot set it up. Coleridge J. referred to Swayn v. Stephens (a).] To hold that a defendant in trover could not set up his own wrongful act under a plea of the Statute of Limitations, would repeal the statute as to this form of action. In Clendon v. Dinneford (b), where the defendant had obtained letters and two books belonging to the plaintiff, and, upon demand, gave up the letters and one book, but kept the other, it was held that the plaintiff might recover for a conversion of the whole. [Littledale J. There the question arose on a demand and refusal. Patteson J. A conversion of part may, as against the wrongdoer, be a conversion of the whole, but it does not follow that he may set it up as such. And in that case it would have been different if the defendant had merely destroyed one of the books.] The question in such cases is, whether a defendant's treatment of part of the property has been such as amounts to a conversion of all. If a bailee has a butt of wine, and offers to deliver all of it to the owner, except five gallons, he may be sued for a conversion of the whole butt.

LORD DENMAN C. J. I think it was not proved in this case that there had been a conversion more than six years before the action was brought. There was, indeed, some evidence of facts upon which an action might have been commenced earlier; whether a jury would have found for the plaintiff upon that evidence or not, I cannot say, but it would not have been satisfactory to me. It appears that, on the bankruptcy of the person who deposited this wine, there were two parties who claimed it. The first evidence which the defendant gives of her own wrongful conversion is a letter of the 22d of November 1827, speaking of a refusal given by her to a demand made in the preceding March. If that demand was by letter, the letter may be supposed to have been in the defendant's possession; but she did not produce it. And there was no evidence when the refusal, if there was one, was sent; it may have been the very day before the letter of the 22d of November was written. In the early part of the proceedings it is evident that the defendant considered herself as balancing between two claims adverse to each other. The circumstance of the wine having been bottled was one upon which the jury were to put their own construction; they have done so, and I think rightly. The question was merely one of fact.

 PHILPOTT
 KELLEY.

LITLEDALE J. I think there was no evidence of a conversion at the distance of time alleged by the defendant. When the first demand is supposed to have been made, she appears to have been ignorant who was the party entitled; and it is not shewn that she gave any refusal as against the plaintiff. As to the bottling, there is no evidence who directed that to be done; but it appears that the wine was deteriorated by being kept in the wood; and the most obvious inference from the facts would be, that the plaintiff, for whom it was deposited, himself desired that it should be bottled. This, however, being done, some of the wine was afterwards consumed; but at what time that happened does not appear; and the fact, I think, is not available to shew that the bottling was in itself an act of ownership

PHILPOTT

amounting to a conversion. It was not such an act, if done by the direction of the party depositing, or if done for the best, with a view to preservation. The demand in November 1827 refers to a previous one in March in the same year; but at that time two parties were alleging a title to the wine; if there was a refusal then, it does not shew that the defendant herself claimed to keep it. All that passed at that time may have been, that she may have said, "I will take care that the wine does not go out of my cellar," without, however, giving any absolute refusal to either party. But, in fact, we are in the dark as to this part of the case. I think the rule ought to be discharged.

PATTERSON J. The plaintiff makes a prima facie case by the demand in 1833: but the Statute of Limitations being pleaded, the defendant has to prove a conversion more than six years before the commencement of his action. A case of Swayn v. Stephens (a) was cited by my brother Coleridge, in which, although the defendant had actually sold the ship for which the action was brought, more than six years before, the Court presumed, in favour of the plaintiff (who had been unable to sue the defendant by reason of his remaining abroad), that the ship had come to the defendant's hands a second time, and been converted anew. That decision was against the opinion of one of the Judges, and savours of subtlety; if such a question arose now, I should doubt if it would be decided in the same manner. The attempt here is to establish a conversion in two ways. First, by a demand and refusal; but in that

(a) Cro. Car. 245. 333.

I think

I think the plaintiff fails. It is said that, from the construction to be put upon the letter of November 1827, a previous refusal is to be inferred. That was for the jury; and if the point was not distinctly put to them, and we are to place ourselves in the situation of a jury, I should say that a different construction was the more reasonable one. The assignees at first claimed the wine. The defendant was ordered by the plaintiff not to deliver it to them. The fair presumption then, is, that she retained it only till the rights of parties should be established. What the demand was, which is said to have been made in March, or how it was answered, is not shewn by the evidence. The threat in the letter of November 1827, that proceedings will be taken against the defendant, may prove that the attorney thought there had been a demand and refusal; but the offer of an indemnity shews that the assignees were supposed still to keep up a claim, and supports the inference that the defendant was at that time holding the property only till the rights of the claimants should be ascertained. I do not say, under these circumstances, that there may not have been a demand and refusal before the commencement of the six years; but it was not proved, and the proof of it lay on the defendant.

Then, secondly, it is contended that the bottling of the wine was a conversion: and I do not say that it would not have been so, if the defendant had clearly done it on her own account, and adversely to the proprietor. But it appears to have taken place just when the assignees and the plaintiff were demanding the wine; and it is much more like an act done to preserve it until the right could be ascertained, than an exercise of ownership. It is urged, however, that the wine was afterwards consumed by the defendant. But, in the first place, there is no proof when that happened, and we are not to make a presumption in favour of a party setting up his own wrong. And, secondly, even if a part of the wine was drunk more than six years before the commencement of the action, I think that the mere taking away or destroying a part of property which remains in the hands of a bailee is not such a conversion that the owner may sue in trover for the whole. In Richardson v. Atkinson (a), where part of the liquor was drawn off, it was held to be a conversion, but the defendant had filled the vessel up with water. I am not prepared to say that, if a person draws off part of the contents of a cask, and is ready to deliver the rest, his taking away such part is necessarily a conversion of the whole. No case has gone that length yet. If it were so held, a person with whom a cask of liquor was deposited, and who wished to convert all of it, might draw off a part of the contents, and, if the vessel remained with him for six years afterwards, refuse to deliver up the rest, and set up his conversion of a part so many years ago in answer to an action of trover. In Clendon v. Dinneford (b), which has been cited, the defendant had the books and letters, which were the subject of the action, in his possession when they were demanded on behalf of the plaintiff; and he refused them to the party making the demand, but offered to give them up to another person connected with the plaintiff. That person afterwards applied, but could only obtain the letters and one of the books, which the plaintiff, for the sake of the letters, consented to take. This was not a destruction of part, but a delivery of part only, after a promise to deliver the whole. And if a person, having in his possession several things belonging to another, all of which it is in his power to deliver up, refuses to let the owner have more than a part of them, that may be a conversion; but the present is a different case.

(b) 5 Car. & P. 13.

PHILPOTT
KELLEY.

COLERIDGE J. The statement of the question almost disposes of this case. The burden of proof, upon the plea of the statute, lay on the defendant; and the question is, not whether, upon the acts done, a jury, or this Court, putting itself in the place of a jury, would have been warranted in finding a conversion, but whether the facts are so clear that the Judge should have put it to them almost as a conclusion of law, that a conversion was proved; or so clear at all events that they ought to have found a conversion. As to the acts themselves, the bottling, particularly when coupled with the consumption of the wine afterwards, might, if it had been ascertained when and by whose direction the bottling took place, have been evidence of a conversion of the whole. But this must depend upon the circumstances, and some of those, we know, lead to a contrary conclusion; as, for instance, the state of the wine while remaining in the wood. The drinking may have been intended when the wine was bottled, or may have been thought of afterwards: that was for the jury. As to the legal effect of the consumption of part of the wine, I agree with my brother Patteson; I should be sorry if it could ever be held that taking a part of the property under such circumstances amounted to a conversion of the whole; that the fraud so committed, and the ignorance of the party against whom it was practised, could protect the wrongdoer from an action; and that a person who had been for a long time the bailee of a quantity of wine, and who had drunk six dozen, or one dozen, of it six years ago, might set that up as a defence against the claim of the owner. I say this as to the law, but it lay on the defendant to make it clear in fact, which it is not, that the wine had been drunk six years before the action was brought. With respect to the alleged demand and refusal, that would only be evidence of a conversion; and as to the fact of demand and refusal, we do not know enough from the case before us to say that the conclusion insisted upon for the defendant is the only proper one. There is no ground, therefore, to disturb the verdict.

Plaintiff employed defendant, without reward, to carry 45*l.* for him to a person at Liverpool. Defendant did not deliver it, and afterwards told plaintiff that he had lost it in a brothel, but would repay it to him. There was no other evidence how the loss had happened.

Plaintiff sued defendant for 45*l.* had and received to his use.

Held, that the action lay, independently of the promise, defendant not having paid over the money or returned it to plaintiff: that if a loss, in the manner alleged, had been proved, the action should have been for gross negligence, and not for money had and received; but that the defendant's assertion was not satisfactory proof of his own gross negligence.

that purpose, gratuitously, but did not pay it; and that, being questioned afterwards on the subject, he said he had "lost the money among the whores." It was also proved that he had on another occasion told the plaintiff he would repay him the money out of certain funds, which he described. Upon this evidence it was objected that the plaintiff could not recover as for a debt, but should have declared specially for damage arising from the defendant's gross negligence. The learned Judge gave leave to move to enter a nonsuit, and the plaintiff had a verdict for 45*l*. A rule nisi was obtained in the next term.

John Jervis now shewed cause. It may be taken as proved that the money was delivered to the defendant for the specific purpose of his paying it to a particular person at Liverpool (a). He lost it, and promised to reimburse the plaintiff. The case stands as if the defendant, after receiving the money to pay over, had come back to the plaintiff and merely stated that he had not paid it: the account he gives of the loss places him in no better situation. His employment to carry the money was determined by his own act; he had omitted paying it to the party entitled; he had not substituted himself for the plaintiff as debtor to that party; and he did not return the money to the plaintiff. There was, then, a complete cause of action for money had and received, independently of the promise to repay.

Miller, contra. The case is, in substance, that the plaintiff asked the defendant to carry a sum of money for him, and deliver it to a person at Liverpool; the defendant got into loose company and lost it, and then said he would replace it. No part of the present declaration applies to such a case. No debt has been incurred. The ground of action is negligence, and the question whether or not the defendant (a bailee without reward) was guilty of gross negligence, cannot be raised on a count for money had and received. Lightfoot v. Creed (a) shews that such collateral questions are not to be tried on the money counts. Money had and received lies only for a liquidated sum; Harvey v. Archbold (b). As to the subsequent promise in this case, that was merely an undertaking to pay damages; the sum lost would be the measure of those damages. [Paterson J. You must contend that, even if the money had not been lost, but the defendant had not chosen to return it, the action must have been for not returning it, and money had and received would not have lain.] If the defendant had used the money, it might. The particular of demand here shews that the ground of action is not money had and received, or an account stated.

Lord DENMAN C. J. This action is not grounded upon the alleged gross negligence. The defendant had money to pay for the plaintiff, and has not paid it. The prima facie case, therefore, against him is, that he has it still to pay. He is to extricate himself from that. He endeavours to do so by saying that it is true he received the money, but he has lost it in such and such a manner. Is that sufficient? The case is something like one which was before us yesterday (a). The party is clearly responsible for the money, but seeks to excuse himself by saying that he has lost it, and under such circumstances that he is only chargeable in an action for gross negligence. If he is to avail himself of his own wrong to defeat an action which otherwise would lie, he must give clear proof of it. His own admissions are not such proof. The promise made by him to reimburse the plaintiff was not wanted to render this action maintainable.

(a) 8 Taunt. 268. Littledale J. referred to Lindon v. Hooper, Cowp. 414.

(b) 3 B. & C. 626.

 PARRY
 against
 ROBERTS.

LITTLEDALE J. The money did not come to the defendant's hands originally as money had and received by him to the plaintiff's use, but as a sum entrusted to him for a specific purpose. It appears that that purpose was not carried into effect. How did that happen? By misappropriation? If so, money had and received would lie. But the question is, whether that conclusion can be come to. The defendant says he lost the money in a brothel. If we believe that, the action should have been brought, not for money had and received, but for negligence. But we are not bound to believe the excuse which he alleges; and if we do not, and the rest of the case raises so much suspicion that the jury might infer a misapplication of the money, there cannot be a new trial.

PATTESON J. It appears that a sum of money was entrusted to the defendant for a particular purpose, but was not applied by him to that purpose. If the sum remained in the defendant's hands, and the plaintiff upon enquiry found that it had not been applied, he was entitled to say, "Give me back the money; I countermand the direction to pay it:" and, if the defendant refused, his remedy was by action for money had and received. But here the defendant says that he has not the money, and the only account he gives of it is, that he has lost it in a very negligent manner. I think that it did not lie in his mouth to say that he no longer had the money because he had lost it in a brothel. The verdict, therefore, is right.

COLERIDGE J. I agree that if the ground of this action had been a negligent loss, money had and received was not the proper form. But the fallacy of the defendant's case is, that he seeks to throw an issue on the plaintiff where he has no right to do so. He admits that he has not delivered the money, but says he has lost it in the manner described. The plaintiff is entitled to say that the money was received to his use, and that the defendant is bound to account for it. The answer attempted by him does not disturb the plaintiff's case.

Rule discharged.

EJECTMENT for messuages in Brecknockshire. On the trial before Gurney B. at the Brecknockshire Lent assizes 1834, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with leave reserved to move to enter a verdict for the defendants. In Easter term last John Evans obtained a rule accordingly. Several questions arose upon the argument, but the only point upon which the Court decided was the construction of the will of Herbert Herbert, deceased, who had died seised in fee of the premises in question. The will was as follows: — “I give and bequeath to my dear wife Margaret, her heirs and assigns for ever, the house in which we now live and all the furniture therein, and all other the property of which I die possessed, with the intention that she may enjoy the same during her life, and by her will dispose of the same as she thinks proper: and whereas my father did by his last will give and bequeath to my sister Susanna Lewis the house next to mine” (not being part of the premises in dispute), “and in which she now lives, now, in case the said will should not be sufficient for the purpose of giving her the said house as aforesaid, I do hereby, as far as in me lies, give and bequeath to her the said Susanna, her heirs and assigns for ever, the said house in which she lives, relinquishing all right and title to the same which I may have.” The defendants claimed under a conveyance in fee made made to them by the wife after H. Herbert's death; and it was admitted, on the part of the lessor of the plaintiff, that the defendants were entitled to the verdict if the wife took a fee under the will in the property bequeathed to her.

Tenant in fee simple devised land to his wife, her heirs and assigns, for ever, “with the intention that she may enjoy the same during her life, and by her will dispose of the same as she thinks proper.” Held, that the wife took a fee; though, in a later part of the will, the deviser limited lands in fee by using the words “heirs and assigns for ever,” without any additional words.

John Wilson and Cooper now shewed cause. The wife took an estate for life, with a testamentary power of appointment as to the remainder. The earlier words "to my wife, her heirs and assigns, for ever," would, of course, give a fee simple, were it not for the words which follow, "with the intention that she may enjoy the same during her life, and by her will dispose of the same as she thinks proper." The latter words shew that the deviser did not intend to give the absolute fee: and such a construction must be put upon the will as will give effect to all the words. It is clear that the deviser knew that the words "heirs and assigns for ever," if not followed by qualifying words, would give a fee, for these words are used simply, and by themselves, in the part of the will relating to Susanna Lewis. In an Anonymous Case, 3 Leon. 71. (a), A., seised in fee, devised to his wife for life, and, after her decease, she to give the same to whom she would; and it was held to be an estate for life only in the wife, with authority to give the reversion by will. In the Year Book, Tr.15 H.7. 12.(b) (cited in Jennor and Hardie's Case (c)), a case is put of a devise, that A. shall have lands in perpetuum during his life; and it is said that this would give but a life estate, though there can be no doubt that the words "in perpetuum" would, by themselves, have given a fee (a). The devisor's intention in the present case probably was to give the property completely to the wife, subject only to the restriction of not being able to alien during her life. This intention might have been fulfilled, by giving the estate to the wife and her heirs, to the use of herself for life, and, after her death, to such uses as she should by will appoint. The will, as it now stands, is only a less formal expression of the same intention. The words in the Statute of Uses are, "to the use, confidence, or trust (b);" these words are as general as those in the will, "with the intention;" this may therefore be construed to be merely an informal limitation of an use. Much latitude has been given as to the expressions which imply an use; thus eâ conditione, eâ intentione, have been held to mean so even in a deed (c). The Anonymous Case, in 3 Leon. 71. was indeed denied to be law in Goodtitle dem. Pearson v. Otway (d); but it was confirmed by Tomlinson v. Dighton (e), and by Doe dem. Thorley v. Thorley (g). In Goodtitle dem. Pearson v. Otway (d) the devise was to P. for life, and, after her death, to her lawful issue, and, if she should have no issue, that she should have power to dispose of the lands at her will and pleasure; and, although the first words gave the estate for life expressly, it was held that, in default of issue, P. took a fee by the later words (a): the later words, there, were much less definite than those in the present case. In Doe dem. Thorley v. Thorley (b) the devise was to the wife during her natural life, and also at her disposal afterwards to leave it to whomsoever she pleased: and the estate was held to be for life only, with a testamentary power of appointment by virtue of the later words, which are less strong than those in the present case; for there the word "leave" was held to confine the exercise of the power to a testamentary appointment, whereas here the "will" is expressly designated. A case (c), before the Statute of Uses, given in Fitzherbert's Abridgment, Devise, 22., is referred to in The Earl of Bedford v. Russel (d), and again in 1 Powell on Devises, p. 209. (e), as follows:—"If a man devise lands to another in fee, he hath the use and title of it; but if it be limited to his use for his life only, the use of the fee shall be to the heir of the devisor; for, by the limitation, his intent shall be taken to be otherwise than it would have been taken if this limitation had not been." This shews that the words "heirs and assigns" here do not necessarily give a fee. If there be any inconsistency between these words and the words which follow, the former may be rejected. In 1 Sugden on Powers, ch. iii. s. 1. (11.) &c. (g), there is a discussion upon some of the cases above referred to; and, among others, upon the two cases cited from Leonard. And the author lays it down (h) that, "wherever a power is clearly intended to be given, the

devisee cannot be holden to take a fee:" and it is also said (a), that the "rule is more inflexible where a specific mode of exercising the power is pointed out;" which is the case here. It is, besides, a general rule, that the heir is not to be disinherited unless the intention be plain. Timewell v. Perkins (b) is a strong instance of this rule.

John Evans and E. V. Williams, contra, were stopped by the Court.

LORD DENMAN C. J. We all think it perfectly clear that the wife took a fee. We should otherwise have to reject the words "heirs and assigns," for the purpose of giving effect to other words which are not inconsistent with them, inasmuch as, if the wife had a fee, she would enjoy the estate during her life, and might dispose of it by will as she thought proper. The only doubt which I felt arose upon the Anonymous case, from 3 Leon. 71. But it is clear that that case is not an authority in favour of the plaintiff: there the devise was merely for life, in the first instance, and, after the death of the devisee for life, the remainder was to go to whomsoever she gave it to; the Court held this to give an estate for life, with a power to appoint the remainder; and they concluded by saying that, if an express estate had not been appointed to the wife, a fee-simple would have passed by the other words; and this, though the words "heirs and assigns" did not occur.

LITLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion. The case in Leonard is to be understood as my Lord has explained it. In the will now before us, the later words are not inconsistent with the earlier. By the earlier words the wife had that power which the later words profess to give. If the later words abridged the estate given by the earlier ones, the effect might be different; as, for instance, if the later words shewed an intent not to give the fee. This inference might be made, if there were a limitation over, as there was in Chycke's case, reported in Dyer (a), and the cases cited in Treby's note there, two of which are Chamberlaine v. Turner (b), and Whit-ting v. Wilkins (c). There might therefore be a doubt, if there were first a limitation in fee, and afterwards a devise over. But, in the present case, the later words amount only to a permission to do what the devisee might have done without the permission. I have no doubt whatever on the point.

PATTERSON J. I am of the same opinion. The cases cited in argument go no further than to shew that, where there is a devise for life in the first instance, a power to dispose of the property after the death of the devisee may in some instances not expand the devisee's estate into a fee. If, in this case, the first part of the devise gave a life estate only, that would be so. But the words in the first part are "heirs and assigns," and the lessor of the plaintiff must cut down the effect of these words by subsequent ones. No doubt some words would do so; as was the case, for instance, in Barker v. Barker (d), where the devise was to A. and her heirs, and, if she died leaving issue, then to the issue: and it was held that A.'s husband could not be tenant by the courtesy, because the wife had not the inheritance. But no subsequent words occur in the present case capable of having such an effect. There is no devise over, no abridgment of the estate: there is merely an intention expressed that the wife should have power to do that which she would be entitled to do without any such expression.

COLERIDGE J. I am of the same opinion. We should so construe the will, as to give effect to the deviser's intention by giving effect to all the words used by him. Now, first, there is clearly, primâ facie, an estate in fee-simple devised. I do not say that words might not come afterwards which would shew that this was not the intention of the deviser. But here the later words only express his intention that the wife should enjoy for her life, and have the power of devising as she pleased. If we held that these words cut down the meaning of the earlier ones, we should be introducing, in one part, a meaning inconsistent with the other part. We are bound to see whether the two parts do not admit of a consistent meaning; and they may be construed consistently by holding that the deviser meant to give a fee, and to mention all the incidents of a fee which occurred to him at the time. This I believe to be all that he did mean.

NECK against HUMPHERY and PEEK.

In an action against a sheriff for escape of a prisoner arrested on mesne process, the plaintiff proved the arrest by producing the sheriff's return of cepi corpus et paratum habeo: Held, that the latter words of the return produced by the plaintiff did not conclude him from proving the escape by parol evidence that the prisoner was at large after the return, and no bail bond lodged with the sheriff.

THIS was an action against the sheriff of Middlesex for the escape of a prisoner arrested on mesne process. On the trial before Lord Denman C. J. at the sittings in Middlesex, May 1834, the plaintiff, in order to prove the arrest, put in the sheriff's return to the capias, made on the 3d of September, that he had taken the party and had the body ready; and evidence was given that the prisoner was at large on the 10th of September; and that on the 10th and 11th of September the sheriff's office was searched and no bail bond found. The defendant's counsel then contended that the plaintiff must be called, on the ground that, without the return, there was no evidence of an arrest, that the return must be taken all together, and that, if so taken, it shewed that the prisoner was in the sheriff's custody at the time of the return: that the plaintiff might have ruled the sheriff to bring in the body, or have brought an action for a false return (a): but that he could not insist upon the caption as proved by the return, without admitting that the sheriff had the prisoner ready if called on. The Lord Chief Justice refused to nonsuit, but reserved leave to move. Evidence was then given for the defendants to shew that in fact there was a bond in the office on the 11th

JOHN EVANS and JAMES THOMAS against DAVID EVANS.

In an action for use and occupation of lands by the sufferance and permission of the plaintiffs, it appeared that the lands were let by auction by the plaintiffs, E. and T., who were auctioneers, to the defendant, under conditions which stated the letting to be "By E. and T., auctioneers." One of the conditions was, "The rent is to be paid into the hands of E. or T., auctioneers, or to their order, at two payments," &c. At the foot of the document was written, "Approved by me, David Jones." Jones was the tenant at the time of the sale. Nothing else appeared in the conditions to shew on whose behalf the letting was. The plaintiffs gave evidence to shew that Jones, being indebted to them, had authorised them to let the lands as above, pay the rent due to Jones's landlord, and retain any surplus in satisfaction of their own debt. Evidence to a contrary effect was given for the defendant. The Judge, in summing up, left it to the jury, whether the plaintiffs had let the lands on their own behalf and as creditors of Jones, or merely as his agents. The jury found a letting by the plaintiffs on their own behalf:

Held, that the conditions imported a letting by Jones, E. and T. acting as his agents; and that the document ought to have been so explained to the jury. And the Judge not having so explained it, a new trial was granted.

DEBT. The declaration stated the defendant to be indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of 85*l.* "for the use and occupation of certain lands with the appurtenances by the defendant at his special instance and request and by the sufferance and permission of the said plaintiffs for a long time before then elapsed, had held, used, occupied, and enjoyed;" also in 85*l.* for the use and occupation of lands with the appurtenances of the said plaintiffs, by the said defendant at his special, &c., and by the sufferance and permission of the said plaintiffs, for a long time, &c., (as before); also in other sums for monies lent, paid, had and received, and on an account stated. Plea, the general issue. At the trial before Gurney B. at the Cardigan Spring assizes 1834, the case for the plaintiffs was as follows: — David Jones, being tenant of the lands in question, and being indebted both to the plaintiffs and to the defendant, made an arrangement with the plaintiffs, who were auctioneers in partnership, that they should let the lands by auction upon the conditions after-mentioned, should pay Jones's landlord the rent then coming due and the rent for the next year, should also pay the rates and other charges on the farm, and, after such payments, should retain to their own use the overplus of the rent at which the lands might be let, and should have a certain allowance for collecting. The lands were let by auction. The conditions, which were read at the letting, were in these words: —

“Fields let by auction at Veniog, in the parish of, &c., on the 16th day of October 1832 (being the farm of Veniog), subject to the following conditions: —

“By Messrs. Evans and Thomas, auctioneers.

“First, the fields are let from to-day till Michaelmas next, free from all rates (tithes excepted).

“Secondly, the rent is to be paid into the hands of John Evans or James Thomas, auctioneers, or to their order, at two moieties or payments, that is to say, one half on the 10th day of July next, and the remaining half on the 29th day of September following.

“Approved of the above conditions

“By me, David Jones.”

After which followed a description of the lots. The defendant took the lands and occupied them. The plaintiffs received rent from him in respect of them, and paid it over to the landlord. At the close of the plaintiffs' case the defendant's counsel contended that there must be a nonsuit, for that the plaintiffs, who let as auctioneers, could not maintain an action for use and occupation; and Jarvis v. Chapple (a) was cited. The learned Judge over-ruled the objection, saying that in the present case there was an express contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant. Evidence was then given on the defendant's part, to shew that no such arrangement existed between Jones and the plaintiffs as above stated; that they let the premises and received the rents merely as his agents, and that the defendant took the lands upon an understanding with Jones (previous to his supposed arrangement with the plaintiffs), that he should make a deduction from the rent in respect of the sum which he owed the defendant. The learned Judge left it to the jury whether the plaintiffs had disposed of the land as agents for Jones, or on their own behalf as creditors, and to reimburse themselves for money which they had advanced; adding that, in the latter case, the defendant could not, after having heard the conditions of sale read, and agreed to pay the rent to the plaintiffs, avail himself of an alleged private arrangement between himself and Jones to defeat the plaintiffs' claim; and that, even if such arrangement existed, it made no difference, as the defendant had agreed to pay the plaintiffs. The jury found for the plaintiffs, and said they thought that the plaintiffs had let to the defendant under the agreement between them and David Jones, on their own account as creditors, and not as agents. In the ensuing term John Evans obtained a rule nisi for a nonsuit to be entered upon the objection above stated, or for a new trial (a).

Maule now shewed cause. There is no reason that the plaintiffs, supposing that they let the land as auctioneers, should not maintain an action for use and occupation,

(a) It was denied, on shewing cause, that leave had been reserved to move for a nonsuit. The rule was also for reducing the damages, on a ground not material here.

occupation, if the defendant has in fact occupied by their permission, and engaged to pay them. It is not necessary that the party bringing such a suit should have an actual title to the land, and the declaration does not in both counts state the lands to have been lands of the plaintiffs. If a defendant has, at his request, been permitted to do a thing which the plaintiff might permit or refuse, that is sufficient consideration for a promise. In Lewis v. Willis (a) it was held that nil habuit in tenementis was no answer to an action for use and occupation; and that case is recognised as authority in Curtis v. Spitty (b). Hull v. Vaughan (c) shews that this action may be maintained, though the plaintiff have not a complete legal right to the premises, and though there may not have been a distinct relation of landlord and tenant between the parties. [Coleridge J. The question here is, whether the "sufferance," which is the ground of action, was in fact the sufferance of the plaintiffs? You assume that it was.] There was an agreement between Jones and the plaintiffs that the plaintiffs should allow such persons to occupy as they thought fit, and receive the rents; and it was evident that the defendant must have been cognisant of that engagement. And in fact the plaintiffs had, by that contract, such an interest in the lands as entitled them to let upon their own account: it is not correct to say that they let as auctioneers. The transaction between them and Jones amounted nearly, if not altogether, to an assignment. [Patteson J. If they were to let as principals it is strange that the condition should make the rent payable not to, but into the hands of, Evans or Thomas, and should mention them as "auctioneers.]" That is merely a description added to the names. The payment is not to be made to them "as auctioneers." And it is to them "or to their order," which is not usual in the case of agents. [Littledale J. If you put the case as that of a contract made with persons not having title, for a mere permission to occupy, should not the plaintiffs have declared specially on that contract?]

Sir W. W. Rollett (with whom was Evans) contrà. To render this action maintainable, there should have been such a contract as would place the plaintiff and defendant in the relation of landlord and tenant. Mere sufferance and permission, in the strict sense, is insufficient: otherwise a steward or bailiff might bring an action for use and occupation against any person whom he had permitted to occupy under his employer. [He was then stopped by the Court.]

Lord DENMAN C. J. If it clearly appeared that the defendant was aware of such an arrangement as has been suggested, between the plaintiffs and David Jones, that might vary the case. But it is manifest that the defendant took under the conditions of sale. Now the conditions merely import that fields are to be let by auction by the plaintiffs, auctioneers, and it cannot be doubted that the defendant knew that David Jones was owner. Then come the words, "the rent is to be paid into the hands of John Evans or James Thomas, auctioneers, or to their order," in certain instalments; and then follows "approved of the above conditions, by me, David Jones." Looking at these conditions, which in fact constituted the agreement, there is no proof whatever that the defendant considered that he should hold from the plaintiffs. On the contrary, the signature of David Jones shewed that he was not to hold from them.

 EVANS

LITLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion. The words "by Messrs. Evans and Thomas, auctioneers," shew that they represented themselves as the mouth-piece of the person really letting. Then, "the rent is to be paid into the hands of John Evans or James Thomas, auctioneers, or their order," and at the end is added, "approved of the above conditions, by me, David Jones." It was known, therefore, that he was the owner; and the meaning was "I, David Jones, authorise you to let." That is the only authority given. It is true that he goes on to say, "pay the rent into the hands of John Evans or James Thomas," and payment to them would have been a discharge. But they are merely agents. The lessor is David Jones: he is therefore the only person to sue.

PATTESON J. The question here does not turn upon the objection stated as a ground of nonsuit. There must be a new trial on the question of fact, not on any point of law. The question of fact is, By whose permission did the occupation take place, and by whom was the contract made? That is in general a matter to go to the jury; but if the question depend upon the construction to be put on a document which is in evidence, then it rests with the Court. Here the conditions of sale constitute the only document, and upon that I can see no doubt. If the plaintiffs let for themselves, why is David Jones's name added? The plaintiffs would in that case have been the persons to sign. The document does not say by whom the premises are let. It is true that the rent is to be paid into the hands of “Messrs. Evans and Thomas, auctioneers:” but this amounts only to an authority given by Jones to pay into their hands; indeed, it is more than authority; it is an express direction. This was not put to the jury by the learned Judge. He has, therefore, not explained to them the proper construction of the document.

COLERIDGE J. At first I thought that the fact was properly left to the jury. But as it was to be determined by the construction of a document, the effect of that document should have been properly explained to them by the Judge. Here the letting was, professedly, by the plaintiffs as auctioneers, and Jones signed the conditions. There may have been an understanding between the plaintiffs and Jones, that the plaintiffs should pay themselves out of the rents. But as to the contract of the defendant, there was clearly a misdirection.

Platt, in support of the demurrer. It is true that the statute 17 G. 3. c. 57., on which this action is brought, must be read in conjunction with stat. 8 G. 2. c. 13. s. 1., and that this latter act gives the copyright of such prints as are there described, to the inventor "for the term of fourteen years, to commence from the day of the first publishing thereof, which shall be truly engraved with the name of the proprietor on each plate, and printed on every such print or prints." (a)

But

(a) The section then goes on to impose penalties for pirating "any such print or prints."

The stat. 7 G. 3. c. 38., passed "to amend and render more effectual" the former, gives "the benefit and protection of the said act and this act," subject to the restrictions and limitations which are afterwards mentioned, to the engravers, &c. of original prints, (s. 1.), and also of prints taken from any picture, drawing, sculpture, &c. (s. 2.). Section 5. enables parties to proceed for penalties "in like manner, and under the like restrictions and limitations," as by the former act is appointed; and s. 7. enacts, "that the sole right and liberty of printing and reprinting intended to be secured and protected by the said former act and this act, shall be extended, continued, and be vested in the respective proprietors, for the space of twenty-eight years, to commence from the day of the first publishing of any of the works respectively hereinbefore and in the said former act mentioned."

But these words do not make the engraving of the name and date a condition precedent to the vesting of the property, or to the right of suing for an invasion of it. Those rights accrue "from the day of the first publishing" of the print; they are not modified by the subsequent words of direction, "which shall be truly engraved with the name of the proprietor on each plate." Newton v. Cowie (a) is indeed a contrary decision, and the Court of Common Pleas there must have construed the words as conditional. The judgment, grounded on such a construction, may require to be reconsidered. In this court no decision to the same effect has been given upon these statutes. [Thesiger, contra, mentioned Thompson v. Symonds (b). Lord Denman C. J. Lord Ellenborough, in Roworth v. Wilkes (c), differed from the opinions expressed in that case.] The views taken of this and similar acts have been various (d); the Court will not incline to that which is unfavourable to property. [Lord Denman C. J. It is the proprietor's own fault if he suffers a hardship. It is easy for him to comply with a regulation which is very simple and useful, and which makes the date part

At all events, the statute 17 G. 3. c. 57., which was passed for the purpose of enlarging the privileges of the artist, gives him a right of action for injuries to his copyright, without any such restriction or condition as is supposed to attach under the previous statute. LORD DENMAN C. J. The last-cited decision turned upon the words of a statute differently framed from those in question. It is unnecessary to say more than that Newton v. Cowie (a) was decided on great consideration, and must govern the present case.

LITLEDALE J. I think that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Newton v. Cowie (a) was perfectly correct. The words "which shall be truly engraved on each plate" are not merely directory, but make such engraving part of the thing to be protected. The stat. 17 G. 3. c. 57. was intended only to give the proprietors of plates a further remedy. Before that act, the person infringing the copyright was liable only to forfeit his plate and prints, and five shillings for each print. As many engravings are published at a great expense, this was an insufficient remedy for their being pirated; and therefore the act of 17 G. 3. c. 57. was passed,

THACKER against CHRISTOPHER WILSON WILSON.

Under stat. 14 G. 3. c. 78. (Building Act) s. 41. where a party wall has been rebuilt, the person who is owner of and entitled to the improved rent of the adjoining premises, is liable to contribution out of such rent, though he be no other-wise owner than as an executor or administrator.

And this, although there be a judgment outstanding, of a date prior to the pulling down of the wall, and no sufficient assets to meet it.

For the portion of the rent claimable in respect of such contribution is not assets.

ASSUMPSIT. The declaration (January 18th, 1834), stated that, after the passing of stat. 14 G. 3. (c. 78), an old party wall had been pulled down and another built in lieu thereof, by and at the expense of the plaintiff, agreeably to the act, between a messuage of the plaintiff, situate, &c., and a messuage of the defendant adjoining thereto, situate, &c., being of a higher class of building than that of the plaintiff; that the defendant, at the time of the pulling down, &c., and building, &c., was the owner of, and entitled to, the improved rent of the said adjoining messuage, and that he upon that occasion made use of the party wall so built by the plaintiff, whereby and according to the statute he became liable to reimburse and pay the plaintiff 33*l.*, being a moiety of the ascertained expense of building so much of the said wall as the defendant made use of, together with certain other expenses, which the declaration specified; and that, being so liable, the defendant promised to pay on request. The declaration then stated an account (described scribed according to sect. 41. of the act) to have been left by the plaintiff at the defendant's house, and payment demanded more than twenty-one days before the commencement of this action. There was also a count for monies paid, monies had and received, and on an account stated.

Pleas. 1. Non assumpsit. 2. To the first count, that, before and at the time of the making of the supposed promise in that count mentioned, the defendant was administrator (by letters granted February 1st, 1830) of the goods and chattels of Thomas Newberry, and that before and at the time of the pulling down, &c., and building, &c., and until the making of the supposed promise in the first count mentioned, the defendant was such owner of and entitled to the improved rent of the said messuage as therein mentioned, as administrator as aforesaid, and in right of the said Thomas Newberry, under and by virtue of an indenture of demise (25th of March 1818), for a term of years (still unexpired) from Cook to Newberry, and of a demise or underlease (21st of June 1827) for a term still unexpired, of the same messuage from Newberry to Ebsworth. The plea then went on to state a judgment recovered by Henry and William Wilson against the defendant as administrator of Newberry, before the pulling down of the party-wall, for a just debt due from Newberry in his lifetime, which judgment was still unsatisfied, and that the defendant had fully administered, &c. except as to goods of the value of 10*l*.

Replication to the second plea. That the said improved rent, before and at the time of such pulling down, &c. " was, and from thence hitherto hath been, and still is, a certain annual rent of a large amount, to wit, of the amount of 210*l*. by the year, due and payable able under and by virtue of the said demise or under-lease in the said plea mentioned, for and during the said term thereby granted, and that the same was of such a sufficient value and amount that the said defendant, before the commencement of this suit, by and out of and with the same, over and above and besides all rent and monies due and payable from or by the said defendant under or by virtue of the said indenture in the said plea mentioned, or in respect of or in relation to the premises by that indenture demised, could and might and ought to have paid and satisfied the said plaintiff the said sums of money in the said first count mentioned." Verification. General demurrer and joinder.

Cowling in support of the demurrer. First, this action does not lie against an executor or administrator. Sect. 41. of the Building Act (a) directs that the person

(a) Stat. 14 G. 3. c. 78. s. 41. enacts, "that the person or persons, at whose expense any party-wall or party-arch shall be built agreeably to the directions of this act, shall be reimbursed by the owner or owners who shall be intitled to the improved rent of the adjoining building or ground, and who shall, at any time, make use of such party-wall or party-arch, a part of the expense of building the same, in the proportion after mentioned," &c. "And, in the mean time, and until such moiety" &c. "be so paid, the sole property of such whole party-wall or party-arch, and of the whole ground whereon the said party-wall shall stand, shall be vested entirely in the person or persons at whose expense the same shall be built." "And that within ten days," &c. "such first builder or builders shall leave, at such adjoining house or building, a true account, in writing, of the number of rods in such party-wall or party-arch, for which the owner or owners of such adjoining building or ground shall be liable to pay," &c. "whereupon it shall be lawful for the tenant or occupier of such adjoining building or ground to pay one moiety, or such proportional part, as aforesaid, to such first builder or builders for the same," &c., "and to deduct the same out of the rent which shall become due from him or her to such owner or owners, under whom he or she holds the same respectively, until he or she shall be reimbursed the same :

at whose expense any party-wall shall be built according to the act, "shall be reimbursed by the owner or owners who shall be intitled to the improved rent of the adjoining building or ground," and who shall make use of such wall. The word "owner," there, must mean owner in his own right, not as executor or administrator. The statutes (23 H. 8. c. 15. s. 1., 4 Jac. 1. c. 3. s. 2., 8 & 9 W. 3. c. 11. s. 2.,) on the construction of which it has been held that an executor against whom judgment has been given on demurrer, is not liable for costs (Tattersall v. Groote (a)), contain words as general as those of the present act. It will be said that, if an administrator be not liable, there is no owner of the improved rent who can be resorted to in a case like this. But it is not necessary that there should be such an owner, for, by sect. 41., the builder of the party-wall has a lien upon the whole wall, and upon the land, till he is repaid; and that should have been the remedy taken here. Secondly, if the action lies against an executor or administrator, he is liable only in that character, and want of assets is a defence. It is suggested by the replication that an administrator is bound to apply the improved rent to a payment of this kind. But the administrator has no lien upon the rent, as a landlord has. If he pays out of his own funds, there being no assets, he has no means of recovering back the amount. An executor or administrator of a termor cannot waive the term; and, supposing it to be but a short one, it would

and in case the same be not paid within twenty-one days next after demand thereof, then the same shall and may be recovered, together with full costs of suit, of and from such owner or owners, by action of debt, or on the case, in any of his Majesty's courts of record at Westminster."

be hard if the owner of the neighbouring premises, by pulling down the party-wall, could subject him to an expense for which he might not be able to reimburse himself. There is no direction in the statute, that an executor shall apply the improved rent in this manner. Rent, when received by him, becomes assets, and is to be disposed of as they ordinarily are. Here, if there had been assets not administered, the plaintiff might, perhaps, have maintained his action. But, as the case stands, the tenant in possession was the only person to whom he could have recourse, if he did not choose to enforce the lien, given by the statute, upon the land. It is true that, in Tremeere v. Morison (a), an administrator was held liable for non-repair during his own time, although he pleaded that he held only as administrator, and had derived no profit from the premises. But there the administrator had entered and was in possession. Here, there is a tenant who is the occupier, and an occupier is an owner for the purposes of the clause in question. A landlord may be entitled to treat an administrator as assignee with respect to rent or repairs, but a third person cannot do so unless the administrator is in possession.

Holt, contra. The defendant is liable, not as administrator, but as owner. The second plea is bad on several grounds. First, it does not state that the improved rent was of no value, or of insufficient value to satisfy the demand in question, or of any value in particular. The defendant is sued as the owner of, and entitled to, the improved rent, and by the plea he admits himself to be so. Then the character in which he became such owner is immaterial. If there was any surplus of rent in his hands after payment of the rent due to the original landlord, the rebuilder of the party-wall had a lien upon it. For if the premises be in the hands of an under-tenant, according to sect. 41. of the act, the under-tenant may pay the moiety of expense in respect of the party-wall, and deduct it from his rent. A fortiori, the owner, if the premises are in his own hands, will be bound to pay the moiety of this expense, in preference to the demands of other creditors. The portion of rent, therefore, which would have been applicable to this claim, is not to be placed upon the common footing of assets. The plea, here, ought to have shewn that the improved rent was insufficient to satisfy any part of the demand for the party-wall, after paying the rent to the original landlord. The case is like that of executors of a lessee, who are liable for so much of the rent as the premises are worth; Rubery v. Stevens (a); and the plea should have been like that which was there pleaded. If any portion of the rent remains in the hands of the executor, he is liable for so much. He cannot get rid of a charge imposed by law in respect of that out of which the improved rent issues. Secondly, this may be considered as a disbursement for repairs. The executor of a lessee is liable for repairs as assignee, though the premises yield no profit; Tremere v. Morison (b); where the law is thus laid down by Bosanquet J. (c): "The general rule is, that the executor of a lessee is liable as assignee, except that, with respect to rent, his liability does not exceed what the property yields. No such exception applies to the covenant for repairs." But an owner of improved rent, under this statute, has the same indulgence extended to him with regard to repairs, as an executor has in respect of rent; he is liable only to the extent of what the property will yield. To that extent, however, the claim in respect of the party-wall is, by this statute, equivalent to a lien.

The obligation imposed by the act is, in terms, upon the owner entitled to the improved rent; and as that ownership renders him liable, his executor is also liable by virtue of that office. There is nothing in the act to exempt him, or oblige the tenant in possession to pay in his stead. And this is no hardship on the executor, since he is not required to advance any thing out of his own funds if the improved rent be insufficient.

Cowling, in reply. The plaintiff should either have kept possession of the whole wall till it was ascertained who would pay him, or have called upon the tenant in possession to pay, to the amount which his rent would cover. [Patteson J. The act only says that it shall be lawful for the occupier to pay, not that he shall be obliged.] The defendant receives the improved rent, not in his own right, but as executor; and as soon as it comes to his hands it is in a course of distribution as assets. The second plea, therefore, is a sufficient answer.

LORD DENMAN C. J. I am of opinion that the defendant is the person who, by the act, is bound to pay this demand. As the case is put on behalf of the defendant, the question is whether he or the party who did did the repairs is to lose the money; but I do not see that the defendant, if he pays, will lose it, because the portion of rent applicable to this purpose is not to be considered as assets.

THACKER
against
WILSON.

LITLEDALE J. The defendant has not, by his plea, denied being owner of the improved rent, but he says that the improvement does not affect him in his own character, but as administrator of Newberry, who made the under-lease. If he meant to insist that he was not the owner of an improved rent within the statute, he should have alleged that the rent now received upon the under-lease was less than that paid to the original landlord. The plea suggests nothing to that effect. And as to the ownership, I think an administrator is as much owner for the purposes of this act as if he held by a regular conveyance. A man may have held as administrator for forty or fifty years, and may have let for 200*l.*, himself paying a rent of only 100*l.* Can it be said that such a person is not the owner of an improved rent? His title is as good, for this purpose, as it could be under any other circumstances. The defendant here had held as administrator for several years. An outstanding judgment is pleaded, and it is true, the assets are applicable to that. But the question is, whether the portion of rent claimed for the rebuilding of this party-wall be assets. The plaintiff contends that his claim is a lien upon so much of the rent, and I think it ought to be so, because it is by means of such liability on the part of the adjoining owner that the wall is kept in repair, which otherwise might go to ruin. The charge is a necessary one. But for the maintenance of the party-wall the premises would not continue to bring an improved rent. And if the charge be a lien, the judgment pleaded is no answer.

PATTESON J. If Newberry had been alive, he, having underlet, would be chargeable as the owner of the improved rent; and so is his administrator, he being dead. Then it is said that there is a judgment unsatisfied. But it is clear that if the tenant, who is the actual occupier, had paid this moiety of expenses, which he might have done, he could, by the act, have deducted the amount from the rent payable to the administrator; and the administrator could only have been answerable for the rent as assets, minus the amount so deducted. It makes no difference that the administrator himself pays the sum, and receives the whole rent from the under-tenant.

COLERIDGE J. The defendant admits, by his plea, that he was owner of the improved rent, but says that he was so as administrator. There is no ground for such a distinction. The act was passed for a great public purpose; and it does not, in the clause in question, warrant any inquiry as to the characters in which persons are charged. It imposes the liability generally, and makes no provision for the case of an executor or administrator. An administrator, then, is chargeable, in respect of the improved rent, as an assignee would be for repairs. If that be a legal consequence of his situation, it follows, as another legal consequence, that he would be protected in paying the sum now claimed.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

The KING against The Inhabitants of NEW-MARKET ST. MARY.

Saturday,
May 2d.

ON appeal against an order of two justices, whereby John Porter was removed from the parish of Fordham in Cambridgeshire, to the parish of Newmarket St. Mary in Suffolk, the sessions quashed the order, subject to the opinion of this Court upon the following case:—

The appellants relied upon a settlement in the respondent parish, derived from the pauper's father, who, whilst residing in that parish, served there for two years the office of pinder. He was appointed at a court baron held for the manor of Fordham Biggen on the 5th of September 1787, the appointment being entered on the court rolls in the following words:—“And lastly the said homage did elect John Porter pinder for the town of Fordham for the year ensuing, and until another person be chosen in his stead. And the said John Porter came into court, and was duly sworn to execute the said office.” The first entry on the court rolls of the manor of Fordham Biggen, which can be found, of the appointment of any officer, is at a court baron held on the 1st of November 1693. From that period to the year 1810, when the parish of Fordham was inclosed, there were four courts leet with courts baron, and a great majority of courts baron without a leet; at which the pinders, and other officers of the manor, were appointed and sworn in. In the other instances of courts leet and courts baron being held together (except one,

The manor of B. was one of five manors within the town of F., which town was co-extensive with the parish of F. The bounage of the court baron of B. appointed a pinder for the town of F. for a year, who executed the office accordingly for the year, residing in F.: Held, that he gained no settlement in F. under stat. 3 W. & M. c. 11. s. 6., though there were several instances of appointments by the homage in the rolls of the court; and though the inhabitants of F. enjoyed right of common in B.

where the pinder was appointed by the homage only), the pinders and other officers of the manor were elected by the jury of the leet. From 1739 to 1794 there were eight consecutive courts baron, at which certain persons were, in like manner as the pauper's father, elected pinders by the homage, and sworn in; and there was not one instance on the court rolls of any such appointment at a court leet held as such only. There are in all five manors in the respondent parish, of which the manor of Soham and Fordham is the most extensive; but there is no paramount manor. There were, previous to the inclosure of the parish, three commons in the manor of Fordham Biggen, over which the inhabitants of Fordham had common rights. There were also two pounds, one belonging to the manor of Fordham Biggen, the other to the manor of Soham and Fordham. The only question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the pauper's father was legally placed in the office of pinder, under the above-mentioned appointment by the homage of the court baron in 1787, so as to acquire a settlement in the respondent parish.

The case, stated as above, was argued in Easter term, 1832, when this Court sent it back to the sessions, to find whether the town of Fordham were co-extensive with the parish of Fordham, and more or less extensive than the manor of Fordham Biggen. At a subsequent session, the justices found that the town of Fordham was co-extensive with the parish of Fordham, and was more extensive than the manor of Fordham Biggen; and it confirmed the order of removal, subject as before to the opinion of this Court. .

Biggs

Biggs Andrews (with whom was Gunning), in support of the last order of sessions. The appointment is illegal. The homage of a court baron of the manor could not appoint a pinder for the town, which is more extensive than the manor, even if such a court could appoint at all; for the manor and the town have no connection; and the mere fact of such appointments having been entered on the rolls of the court does not shew the right. But, further, the homage have no power of appointment at all: the appointment is with the court leet; the reason of which is, that the office is derived from that of the reeve, who is an officer of the court leet; Com. Dig. Lect. (M. 3). The office of pinder is not named in any old authority; but it is referred to in some cases which will be cited. [Patteson J. Do you find any thing about the homage? What business have they to appoint? The lord of a manor may have such a right, or the jury of a court leet.] The homage have no such right. And, again, if they had, the office would confer no settlement. The manorial appointment confers no settlement, any more than the office of hogringer to the lord of a manor (a). [Littledale J. The office of hogringer to a parish would give a settlement.] That was so decided in Rex v. Whittlesea (b), where the office was parochial, and the appointment was made by the leet. The words of the statute, 3 W. & M. c. 11. s. 6., are, shall "execute any public annual office or charge in the said town or parish, during one whole year;" which are quite inapplicable to the present case. In Rex v. Clirby (c) the appointment to the office of pinder was by the occupiers of land in the parish; yet it was held to give no settlement. [Lord Denman C. J. No regular appointment was shewn in that case.] At any rate, the service was performed; and the case therefore shews that the execution of the office is insufficient, unless the appointment be regular. A public office should be derived from the crown, mediately or immediately; and this shews why the appointment of the lord of a manor, or his homage, gives no public office. The office of master of a workhouse is not within the statute; Rex v. Mer-sham (a): nor that of organist; Rex v. St. George, Han-nover Square (b). No indictment would lie for not serv-ing the office of pinder; such an officer is not bound to suit and service: nor is there such an office in all pa-rishes or manors; in fact, there appears nothing beyond a personal contract of service. In Jasper v. Eadowes (c) Lord Holt said, "the law has not appointed any such thing as a common pound; they are only by the agree-ment of lords and tenants; and so are haywards and keepers of pounds." [Little-dale J. Does not parco fracto lie in the case of cattle pounded in the pound of the lord of the manor? (d)] That is for a breach of the peace. [Little-dale J. That view is not quite consistent with there being only a contract between landlord and tenant.] Perhaps the appointment of an officer by the leet might be a foundation for the action. [Little-dale J. Then you would distinguish between different sorts of pounds.] An officer appointed by the leet would have the power in all the commons under the jurisdiction of the leet. If this is to be considered a manorial appointment, there ought to have been five appointments, one for each manor.

The distinction, as to publicity of office, between appointments by a court leet and a court baron, was taken, on an application for a mandamus, in Rex v. Hulston (a). In the case of an office in which the parishioners were interested, they would take care either not to appoint, or to remove, a person likely to become chargeable. A manor might extend through several parishes; the court might be held in one, and the duty be exercised, and residence be completed, in another. Other inconveniences might be shewn to arise from considering this a public office within the statute.

[The Court here asked the counsel on the other side if they were prepared to maintain the legality of this appointment.]

Kelly (with whom was John Smith), contra. The question is, whether a custom to appoint in the manner found by the case can be supported; for, if it can, the Court will either infer the custom, or, if that cannot be done, will send the case back to the sessions to find the fact. But the ancient appointments furnish sufficient ground for inferring the custom; it cannot be assumed that every person appointed committed a trespass by acting under the appointment. [Lord Denman C. J. The Court clearly thought, on the preceding argument, that they had decided this case, subject to the question of fact as to the extent of the town, parish, and manor; and it is to be regretted that it was not expressly so decided.] There can be no doubt that the appointment is good, as far as regards the manor; and it is not necessary that it should run through the whole parish (a). [Lord Denman C. J. But the office conferred is professedly one running through all the town; if such an office cannot be conferred by the homage of this manor, how can you support the settlement?] The appointment, as a manorial one, is not impeached. Now the inhabitants of Fordham had rights over the commons in the manor before the inclosure, which took place long after the appointment; so that the notoriety, which has been acknowledged as the proper criterion of the publicity of an office, is established.

An office, to confer a settlement under stat. 3 W. & M. c. 11. s. 6. must be annual in its nature.

Therefore where an act of parliament authorised justices to appoint constables for such period as they should judge expedient, at a salary not exceeding 20*l.* per annum, it was held, that the person appointed gained no settlement, whether the appointment was or was not in fact for a year.

(a) Stat. 10 G. 4. c. xcvi. (local and personal, public), entitled, "An Act to enable the magistrates of the county palatine of Chester to appoint special high constables for the several hundreds or divisions, and assistant petty constables for the several townships, of that county."

By sect. 2. the justices at quarter sessions, upon certain recommendation, may appoint an assistant petty constable for any one township, or for two or more adjoining townships within any hundred or division, "for such period as the said justices, assembled at any quarter sessions," &c. "shall think expedient (except as hereinafter mentioned); and upon any vacancy in the office of any such assistant petty constable, by death, resignation, efflux of time, or otherwise," the quarter sessions are authorised to appoint afresh; "provided always, that no assistant petty constable appointed under this act shall resign his said office until he shall have given to the justices" at petty sessions, "one calendar month's notice at the least of his intention to resign the same office."

By sect. 4. the assistant petty constable is to take an oath that he will well and truly serve the King, in his office, &c. "and that while I shall continue to hold the said office I will, to the best of my skill and knowledge, discharge all the duties thereof faithfully according to law."

By sect. 10. the justices in quarter sessions are authorised to remove any assistant petty constable from his office for any misconduct or incapacity, "or in case they shall at any time think that the necessity for the continuance of such an officer has ceased."

By sect. 11. any three justices, at petty sessions, of the hundred or division for which an assistant petty constable is appointed, may suspend him, and appoint another, till the next quarter sessions; and the justices, at such quarter sessions, may reinstate or remove him.

By sect. 22. the justices at quarter sessions, on the recommendation of three justices at petty sessions acting for any hundred or division, may order a salary for any assistant petty constable appointed for any township within such hundred or division, "provided that such salary shall in no case exceed the annual sum of 20*l.* for each township."

By sect. 23. the justices in quarter sessions, on like recommendation, and with the consent of certain persons therein mentioned, may order, in lieu of the above salary, "any salary not exceeding 50*l.* per annum."

he served the office fifteen months, during the whole of which time he resided in Church Hulme.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the pauper gained a settlement in Church Hulme by serving an office.

Waddington, in support of the order of sessions. This, by the provisions of the statute, was clearly a public office; but it does not appear that it was an annual one within stat. 3 W. & M. c. 11. s. 6. The case states only that the pauper was "duly appointed;" that does not shew an appointment even for a year, in fact, if there could have been a due appointment for a less time, as there clearly might, under the local act. The justices, by sect. 2., may appoint for such period as they think expedient, the exception referring to the power of removal afterwards given. By the same section, the constable may not resign without a month's notice; it follows that, on giving such notice, he may resign. Again, by sect. 10., the quarter sessions have a power of removal. It cannot be said, in answer to this, that a constable, though removeable, is still entitled to continue in office during the current year; for the eleventh section gives the petty sessions the power of immediate suspension. It is true that there might be, under this act, an appointment in fact for a year, subject to the power of removal; but, as there is a discretion, it cannot be assumed that the appointment was for a year. The oath is for faithful service during the continuance of the office, by sect. 4.; in annual offices, it is for service during the ensuing year. [He was then stopped by the Court.]

Evans,

Evans, contra. It must be assumed that this was a general appointment. [Lord Denman C. J. Would that be a good appointment under the act? Patterson J. Would it be more than an appointment during pleasure?] By sect. 22. the salary is to be annual. In Rex v. Lew (a) an assistant overseer, appointed at an annual salary, was held to gain a settlement by his office; and there Bayley J. said, "the pauper was to receive a yearly salary for exercising the duties of it; and although he might be removed within the year, he would continue in the office for a year, unless something was done to determine it within that period." [Coleridge J. The salary is not to exceed a certain annual sum.] Under those words none but an annual salary could be given. [Littleton J. If you hire a man at an annual salary, it means at the rate of so much per annum. Coleridge J. Would an appointment for three months be bad? if not, how can the party have an annual salary, as you interpret the words?] The argument suggested, as to the power of discharge, is answered by Rex v. Lew (a). The offices of parish clerk (b) and sexton give a settlement, though they are not confined to the year. As to the attempted inference from the power of resigning or giving a month's notice, such an argument would destroy every settlement by yearly hiring.

LORD DENMAN C. J. If this office were annual in its nature, we should have wished to see the appointment. But we think that it is not annual in its nature, and that it may last for such time as the justices think proper. The case of Rex v. Lew (a) seemed at first to present a difficulty in the way of this view. But, first, the assistant overseer's office corresponds with that of overseer, which is annual, and by the statute (59 G. 3. c. 12. s. 7.) it is to continue till the appointment is revoked, or till the officer resign. Secondly, the salary is to be annual, by the same section. Thirdly, in Rex v. Lew (a), the salary was, in fact, annual. The case is, therefore, easily distinguishable from the present, where the duration of the office depends on the discretion of the justices.

LITLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion. In Rex v. Lew (a), the officer was an assistant overseer, appointed under the statute 59 G. 3. c. 12. s. 7., which directs that he shall execute all such duties of overseer of the poor as shall be expressed in the warrant of appointment, in like manner and as fully, to all intents and purposes, as the same may be executed by an ordinary overseer. Now the office of an ordinary overseer is annual. The person appointed assistant overseer is to continue in office till he shall resign, or till his appointment shall be revoked: it is, therefore, an annual office defeasible. Rex v. Lew (a) is, consequently, inapplicable. By the words in the act now before us, the appointment is to be for so long as the justices think expedient; it is, therefore, not an annual office.

PATTESON J. In Rex v. Lew (a) the appointment, if for less than a year, would not have been valid.

COLERIDGE J. I am of the same opinion. If the office were annual in itself we should recur to the appointment, in order to see whether it was annual in fact. But here, even if the appointment were in fact for a year, there is nothing to shew that it would be an annual office. I have always understood that the office must be such that, if the appointment were general, it would be assumed that the tenure of it was to be for a year.

ment,

Order of sessions confirmed.

The KING against The Inhabitants of NORTON

Saturday,
May 2d.

ON appeal against an order of justices, whereby John White was removed from the parish of Norton Bavant to the parish of Frome Selwood, the sessions quashed the order, subject to the opinion of this Court on the following case.

The pauper's birth settlement was in Frome Selwood: the pauper, about eight years ago, went to one Gutch, in the parish of Corsley, to hire himself as a colt shearman: Gutch asked the pauper if he liked to work for him for a twelvemonth, and offered him 6s. a week, to work ten hours a day, from five o'clock in the morning till six in the evening, and to leave off in the middle of the day on Saturdays, so as to make up the ten hours a day. The pauper served the year, and slept in the same parish, sometimes at his master's, and sometimes at home. About a month after the pauper entered into the service, it was agreed between him and the master,

A question arising at sessions, as to an alleged settlement by hiring and service in a third parish, the sessions quashed the order of removal, subject to a case, in which the contract of hiring was set out, and the question for this Court was stated to be, whether the pauper gained a settlement by hiring and service in the third parish: Held, that this left the question, whether the contract of hiring was exceptive or not, open to this Court.

Pauper was hired to work for a year, at 6s. a week, to work ten hours a day, from five in the morning till six in the evening; and afterwards it was agreed that he should receive additional pay for over-work: Held to be an exceptive hiring; though the pauper never in fact refused to work over-hours when requested.

that the pauper should receive 1*d.* per hour for over-hours ; and he continued to receive the same to the end of the year. Sometimes he looked after the master's horse, and sometimes he worked in the garden. At the end of the year, the pauper agreed with the master to stay on upon the same terms, with the addition of 6*d.* a week more wages. The pauper served a second year, doing nearly the same work as before. The pauper during both years worked over-hours at his master's request, and never refused when he was wanted. He was sometimes employed on Sundays, and was paid for so doing. The pauper kept an account of his over-time by the direction of his master, and was asked by his master if he would sooner do the over-work in his own time or in his master's. The pauper chose to work his over-hours in the evening. The question for the Court was, whether the pauper gained a settlement by hiring and service in Corsley ; if so, the order of sessions to be confirmed ; if not, then quashed.

Bingham in support of the order of sessions. It is a question of fact, whether this was or was not an exceptive hiring ; and the sessions, by quashing the order, have decided that it was not exceptive. The Court will not now interfere with that decision ; Rex v. St. Andrew the Great, Cambridge (a), Rex v. Rosliston (b), Rex v. St. Martin, Leicester (c). In Rex v. Ardington (d) the Court certainly reversed a decision of the sessions as to the hiring ; but there only one of the preceding cases, Rex v. St. Andrew the Great, Cambridge (a), appears to have been cited. In Rex v. Dunsford (a) this Court sent a case back to the sessions, in order that they might find, as a fact, whether a particular excavation was a mine or not. Supposing the question open, there may be a difficulty, as the Courts have themselves said, in ascertaining any fixed principle for determining whether a hiring be exceptive or not. The latest authority is therefore the highest; and that is Rex v. Ossett-cum-Gawthorpe (b), where a hiring was held not to be exceptive, though, by the original contract itself, the hours of working were limited, with an allowance for over-work; whereas, in the present case, the allowance for over-work was not introduced till a month after the original contract was entered into. It is true that Taunton J. differed from the rest of the Court. The test laid down by Bayley J., in Rex v. Byker (c), whether the time be “only mentioned as the measure of the wages,” is the safest, and shews that here the hiring was not exceptive. The law requires a reasonable time only for work, though the relation of master and servant continue.

Barstow contra. The sessions have set out the terms of the contract, to be interpreted by this Court: they have not found the fact at all. The hiring is exceptive unless the contract gave the master dominion over the servant for an entire year, and this the original contract clearly did not do: neither was it enlarged by what took place afterwards: the servant might still have refused to work the over-hours; and this state of things continued throughout. This right of option on the part of the servant shews an exceptive hiring, as appears from Rex v. Birmingham (a), where Bayley J. distinguishes the case of Rex v. Byker (b) on this ground.

Lord DENMAN C. J. The first argument urged in support of the order of sessions is, that they have found the fact. I cannot assent to that. They have merely found, in effect, that the settlement was gained in Corsley if there was a hiring and service for a year, which is a question left to be determined by this Court. Certainly there is some difficulty in reconciling the decisions, as has often been said. But this case is precisely the same with Rex v. Birmingham (a), which Bayley J. distinguishes from Rex v. Byker (b). By the offer of the master, the pauper was to work for a limited number of hours during the twelvemonth, and was not bound to give any more time to his master. There is, therefore, an exception in the original contract, of which that which took place afterwards formed no part. We have been pressed with the decision in Rex v. Ossett-cum-Gawthorpe (c). We did not mean, by that decision, to overrule Rex v. Birmingham (a), which indeed we expressly distinguished. I do not deny that the distinction was rather refined; and one of my learned brothers thought that the two cases could not be distinguished. In Rex v. Ossett-cum-Gawthorpe (c) there was, in the first place, a hiring for five years; and then came what we considered as merely a definition of the service and wages. Here the actual contract is for ten hours only in the day, beyond which the master could not command the services of the servant. Therefore, without interfering with Rex v. Ossett-cum-Gawthorpe (a), we must hold the order of sessions to have been wrong.

LITLEDALE J. concurred.

PATTESON J. I am of the same opinion. The sessions cannot be said to have found a hiring and service for a year. In Rex v. Ossett-cum-Gawthorpe (a) I did not feel so much pressed by Rex v. Birmingham (b) as by Rex v. Frome Selwood (c), which came nearer to the case then before us. But I thought in Rex v. Ossett-cum-Gawthorpe (a) that the master could have compelled the service during the additional hours. That was the only point as to which there was a difference of opinion: we agreed as to the principle.

COLERIDGE J. I think it would be trifling to say that the fact is found by the sessions. They find the settlement in Corsley, unless the hiring be exceptive; and that question they leave open. It is difficult to reconcile all the decisions; yet there is no class of cases in which the principle is more fixed. The difficulty is this; that, assuming the principle, the Court appears to have come to contradictory opinions as to the application. Perhaps, therefore, it would be better that the sessions should find the fact; for, when the question of fact is sent here, and we are put to judge of it, we are liable to inconsistencies. But, taking this case by itself, can we doubt that the hiring was exceptive? It is for so many hours a day, making up so much in the week. If so, can it be said that no time is excepted? I put the case, therefore, upon this test: if the servant had been called upon to serve for more time, could he have refused? If he could, then the hiring was exceptive, and the sessions were wrong. The distinction between the master's time and the servant's time was afterwards recognised by the master.

DEWAR against PURDAY.

At the close of plaintiff's case leave was reserved to defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. Defendant offered evidence, and the jury retired, and were unable to agree upon their verdict. The Judge, being pressed to discharge them, no counsel on either side being present, directed a nonsuit on the point which had been reserved.

On motion by plaintiff for a new trial: Held, that the nonsuit was irregular, and that defendant, in shewing cause, could not argue the point reserved at the close of plaintiff's case.

CASE for infringing the plaintiff's copyright in the music of a song. At the trial before Lord Denman C. J., at the sittings in Middlesex after Trinity term, 1834, the plaintiff endeavoured to prove that he was the original composer; and, upon this part of the case being closed, Sir J. Scarlett, for the defendant, applied for a nonsuit, contending that there was no evidence to go to the jury. The Lord Chief Justice inclined to this opinion; but he refused to nonsuit, taking, however, a note of the objection. Evidence was then offered for the defendant, to shew that the composition was not original. The Lord Chief Justice left the question of originality to the jury, who retired about four o'clock in the afternoon, and remained shut up all night. At the sitting of the Court the next morning they stated to the Lord Chief Justice that they were not agreed, and requested to be discharged. His Lordship sent them back; but they afterwards informed him again, by message, that they were not likely to agree. The Lord Chief Justice then desired them to attend in Court, and directed enquiry to be made for the

the plaintiff's counsel; but, they not appearing, his Lordship, acting upon the opinion he had entertained on the preceding day, directed a nonsuit, no counsel on either side being present.

against
PURDAY.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, in the ensuing term, moved for a rule to shew cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside and a new trial had. He contended that, under these circumstances, the Lord Chief Justice had no authority to direct a nonsuit. The only regular course would have been to call upon the parties to consent that the jury should be discharged. Where a plaintiff is nonsuited, the supposition is that, the jury having agreed upon their verdict, he is called upon to hear it, but does not appear. He may appear, and in that case the Judge cannot nonsuit. A nonsuit may take place upon the proof given by the plaintiff: it is then supposed that the Judge, upon the evidence as it stands, would direct a verdict for the defendant, and that they would find according to that direction, were it not that the plaintiff, being called upon to hear the verdict, absents himself. But when the jury have withdrawn, and are actually in deliberation on their verdict, and are not agreed, the Judge cannot call the plaintiff to hear the verdict, nor is there any reason for his appearing in Court. Besides, no one has a right to demand the plaintiff but the defendant. The Judge cannot, of his own mere motion, direct a nonsuit. The law on this subject is stated, with the authorities, in 2 Tidd's Practice, 867—9, 9th edit. (a), and is illustrated by the form of entering a nonsuit on the postea, Tidd's Forms, p. 323. ed. 1828. Here the record could not, with truth, have been made up according to that precedent.

A rule nisi having been granted, and the case being now called on, Sir W. W. Follett, who shewed cause, was asked by the Court if he could support the proceeding which had taken place at the trial, and Lord DENMAN C. J. said, I think it necessary to state that I should not, under such circumstances, pursue the same course again. I should either say that the time was come when it was necessary to discharge the jury, or, if that were not so, keep them together. I think that what I did was done unadvisedly. The question, therefore, now comes to be, whether the parties appear here in the same situation as if, after the objection had been raised at the trial on the insufficiency of the plaintiff's case, and the point reserved by me, a verdict had been taken for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. And if so, the further question is, whether, upon the plaintiff's case, there was evidence to go to the jury.

Sir W. W. Follett and Crompton now shewed cause. There was no evidence of title, to go to the jury, and it is now competent to the defendant to insist upon that ground of nonsuit. Where a point is reserved at the trial of a cause, there is always an understood agreement that the parties shall take the opinion of the Court, and that the Court shall stand in the same situation as the Judge did at the trial when the point was taken. If the defendant was at that time entitled to have the plaintiff called, the proceeding afterwards does not take away that right. If the jury had found for the plaintiff, the defendant clearly might have moved.

He

He is not to be in a worse situation because the jury have not so found. If there had been a verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant would have made the motion; as the case stands, the plaintiff makes it. There is no essential difference. (The argument upon the evidence is omitted.)

 DEWAR
 against

Sir J. Campbell, Attorney-General, and Thesiger, contra. The nonsuit was wrong, because the plaintiff did not make a default by failing to appear when there was no right to call him. Then, does it make any difference that, in a previous stage of the trial, liberty had been reserved to move to enter a nonsuit? The power to reserve such liberty is founded on the consent of parties, and must be limited by it. A plaintiff, instead of agreeing to this course, may tender a bill of exceptions. Here the plaintiff consented, on condition that the trial should proceed, and upon the understanding that his consent would not be acted upon unless he obtained a verdict. But, as the case now stands, the plaintiff has lost the advantage which he would have had, if the verdict had been given for him. If he had had a verdict, and the Court had decided in his favour upon the motion to enter a nonsuit, he would have had judgment and execution. But now, if the defendant may proceed upon the reserved point, the plaintiff, on the one hand, runs the risk of a judgment of nonsuit, while, on the other, if the Court decides with him, he can only have a new trial. [Patteson J. If our judgment were for the plaintiff, how could we put him in the same situation as to damages, as if a verdict had been found for him?]

Lord DENMAN C. J. I am satisfied that this rule must be made absolute. I at first thought that the

plaintiff would have been in no better situation if a verdict had originally been entered for him, than he is now. But on consideration I find that this is not so. A party when called to hear the verdict may appear or not, as he thinks proper; he need not be nonsuited. That which took place here, was the ordinary mode in which parties agree to be bound, as to the entry of a nonsuit, by the opinion of the Court. The plaintiff may be considered as having said:—"The condition of my agreeing to this course is, that the cause do now proceed: in that case I have no objection to submit to a nonsuit, if the Court, at a future time, should think it proper." A plaintiff has a right, in making such agreement, to insist upon the chance of a verdict in his favour; and here, the circumstances under which the liberty to move was reserved, entitled the plaintiff to that chance. Having lost it, he may withdraw the consent which he gave at the trial.

LITTLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff's consent was given on the supposition that he obtained a verdict.

PATTESON J. When leave is reserved, by consent of parties, to move to enter a nonsuit, it is on the understanding that the cause will go on and the plaintiff obtain a verdict. If by any circumstance he loses that benefit, the consent does not hold. That was the case here. If, from necessity, the jury had been discharged, the consequence would have been the same.

COLERIDGE J. I am of the same opinion. When leave was reserved to move to enter a nonsuit, the plaintiff,

plaintiff, in consenting to that course, waived his common law right of having the facts submitted to a jury. That waiver was upon a condition which failed.

Rule absolute.

RIDGWAY against The HUNGERFORD Market Company. Tuesday, May 5th.

DEBT. The declaration stated that the plaintiff, on the 10th of June 1830, was nominated, appointed, and retained by the Hungerford Market Company to be, and became, clerk of the company, at a salary of 200*l.* per annum, which it was agreed should be paid quarterly on certain days mentioned in the declaration; that the plaintiff continued clerk from thenceforth to the commencement of the action; and that 150*l.* became and was due to him on the 25th of December 1833, for three quarters' salary. Plea, nil debet. On the trial before Lord Denman C. J., at the sittings in Middlesex, June 1834, admissions, signed by both parties, were read, to the effect that, at a court of directors of the company held on the 10th of June 1830, the plaintiff was appointed clerk of the company, by a minute made in the minute book of the company's proceedings, expressing

A master, who has dismissed a servant, may justify the dismissal by shewing that at the time of the dismissal he knew the servant to have committed an act which justified it: and a jury ought not to be asked whether the master was induced to dismiss him by that act or by some other cause.

A clerk employed by a company to enter proceedings in their minute book, entered on the margin of the minute book a protest in his own name against a summons for appointing a successor to himself: Held, that a jury were justified in finding this to be a sufficient cause of dismissal.

A plaintiff declared that the defendants, a company, had employed him at a quarterly salary; the minute book of his appointment shewed an annual salary only, but several quarterly payments were proved, and no annual one. Semble, that no variance appeared.

Quære, per Coleridge J., whether, if a servant, hired for a year, be improperly dismissed in the middle of a year, he can sue in assumpsit for the wages for that year, or is confined to a special action for an improper dismissal.

the annual amount of the salary, but not the times of payment: and it was proved that up to the 25th of March 1833 the salary was paid quarterly. It was then objected that there was a variance, the declaration describing the contract to be for a quarterly payment, while the minute shewed only a yearly salary. The Lord Chief Justice refused to stop the case. Evidence was adduced on the part of the plaintiff to shew that he continued to act as clerk till the 17th of April 1833, and that he subsequently offered and was willing to remain in the service. For the defendants it was proved that the directors, having determined to dismiss the plaintiff, came to a resolution, which was entered by him as clerk in the minute book, on the 11th of April 1833, to call a court of directors for the 17th to elect his successor; that they directed him to summon the directors accordingly, which he did; and that, to the entry of the resolution in the book, he subjoined a protest in his own handwriting against the proceeding. At the meeting on the 17th he was dismissed, and was not afterwards suffered to serve. It was contended that the plaintiff, having been dismissed for sufficient cause, was not entitled to any portion of his current salary. The Lord Chief Justice desired the jury to say whether the fact of the plaintiff having entered the protest justified his dismissal without notice. The jury, under the direction of the Lord Chief Justice, found a verdict for the plaintiff, with 12*l.* damages, being the portion of salary due rateably, on the 17th of April, since the preceding quarter day. And they found expressly, in answer to a question from his Lordship, that the defendants were justified in dismissing the plaintiff after his entry of the protest. Leave was given to move to increase the verdict to 150*l.*, being the salary due to the end of the year current at the time of the dismissal; with leave also to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit. Rules were obtained accordingly, in Michaelmas term last: and both rules now came on together.

Sir W. W. Follett and J. Henderson for the plaintiff. The alleged variance, if it were admitted, is immaterial; and the Court would, if necessary, exercise the power of giving judgment after verdict, according to the very right and justice of the case, under st. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 24. The Judge at nisi prius might have amended, under section 23. But there is no variance. The minute was not the contract; and the declaration does not assume to describe any instrument of agreement. It is true that the statute (a) which incorporates the company enacts (by s. 29.) that all acts, orders, resolutions, and proceedings of the company shall be entered in a proper book or books; but this does not shew that the directors, who, under sect. 46., have power of appointing and displacing the clerk, cannot exercise that power except by writing. [Kelly, for the defendants, here intimated that he should not insist that the appointment must be in writing.] Then the acting proved the appointment as clerk, and the fact of quarterly payment sufficiently proved the agreement to pay quarterly. dell v. Pontigny (a). Assuming that dismissal for a sufficient cause would bar the right to any current salary, according to the cases of Spain v. Arnott (b) and Turner v. Robinson (c), the answer to the objection in this respect is, that the entry in the minute book was not the cause of dismissal. The dismissal, it is manifest, was previously determined on, and the justification now set up for it is the act of complaining against it. [Lord Denman C. J. The dismissal originally intended would have been no more than an exercise of a master's right to determine the service, paying whatever salary would have been in law due and payable, in the absence of misconduct: here the plaintiff, after writing the protest, issued the summons, and remained and acted as clerk till the 17th. The misconduct was during the service.] The dismissal would have taken place at the same time, even if the protest had not been made; and the defendants never till the trial assigned that as the cause. Suppose a servant guilty of misconduct in June, and that the master knowing it retains him till November, would the right to current salary be destroyed? [Lord Denman C. J. In that case a condonation might be presumed.] Or suppose a master, in ignorance of misconduct, dismisses a servant, can the misconduct be set up as determining a contract which was deliberately determined on another ground? [Lord Denman C. J. In the present case the misconduct was known; and we cannot say that the employers were bound to allege it at the time as the reason of dismissal, nor can we inquire as to their motives: if a sufficient cause of dismissal existed, they had a right to use it.] It should at least have been put to the jury as a distinct question, whether, in fact, the plaintiff was dismissed for the cause which they found to be sufficient. But that finding cannot itself be supported. The act now complained of, if it can be considered the cause, is not a sufficient cause. A fault, which is to operate so as to deprive a party of the right to remuneration even for past labours, must be of a serious kind, and must involve moral misconduct, wilful disobedience, or habitual neglect; Callo v. Brouncker (a). In Turner v. Robinson (b) the act complained of was the inducing the master's apprentice to run away and go to America. In the present case, there was merely the writing of a few lines in a rough minute book. [Lord Denman. C. J. That point was not taken; and the jury have found that the cause was sufficient.]

Kelly, for the defendants. There was a material variance. This point has been argued as if the minute was not the contract. The admissions made by both parties, and read at the trial, expressly state that the plaintiff was appointed clerk by a minute of the court of directors, at a yearly salary, which implies a yearly payment. [Lord Denman C. J. Why might not the directors have afterwards agreed that the salary should be paid quarterly?] There is no proof that they did. The agreement to pay quarterly should have been proved, and not left to inference, in opposition to the legal effect of a written contract. The statute constituting the company requires the presence of five directors to give validity to their acts (c); and it should have been expressly proved that this was complied with at some meeting at which an agreement for a quarterly salary, as described in the declaration, was made. The declaration alleges that the plaintiff remained clerk. The jury have not found that he did so: and the relation of master and servant does not continue after dismissal. The action is, therefore, misconceived: it should have been brought for dismissing without sufficient cause; Hulle v. Heightman (a). The finding of the jury is, in effect, a verdict for the defendants. It is not necessary that the jury should have said that the dismissal was founded on the act of writing the protest, or that the master should state every ground of objection. Evidence of sufficient ground justifies the dismissal. Then, if the dismissal be justifiable, the plaintiff can recover no salary for the current quarter; Spain v. Arnott (b).

Lord DENMAN C. J. One of the grounds upon which the rule for a nonsuit was granted was, that the contract was not proved as laid: the salary being stated in the declaration to be payable quarterly, and the proof being, as was contended, only of a yearly hiring. On the other hand, the plaintiff contended that he was entitled to have the damages increased to the full salary for the remaining three quarters of the year, inasmuch as he was improperly dismissed. I think that the difference between the contract set out in the declaration, and the entry in the minutes, is immaterial; and that there is no variance. It is quite possible that, after the contract described in the minutes had been effected, the plaintiff might have insisted on the payments being made every quarter. But the rule for a nonsuit must be made absolute on another ground, namely, that the plaintiff must be held to have been properly discharged; so that the discussion of any other argument urged in favour of the nonsuit becomes unnecessary. Turner v. Robinson (a), and many other cases, have shewn, that if a party, hired for a certain time, so conduct himself that he cannot give the consideration for his salary, he shall forfeit the current salary, even for the time during which he has served. Now it is not necessary that a master, having a good ground of dismissal, should either state it to the servant, or act upon it. It is enough if it exist, and if there be improper conduct in fact. Suppose a servant had heard that his master intended to dismiss him without notice, and were to insult him in consequence: it is clear that the insult would justify the master in dismissing the servant; and yet, if he intended to dismiss him independently of the insult, the motive for the dismissal would be different from such ground of justification. It is unnecessary to discuss how it would be, if the master, at the time of the dismissal, had no knowledge of the fact which was to justify it; yet I think the justification would be good, even if the fact, existing at the time, were not known to the master. Here the jury have found the existence of a cause justifying the dismissal. Although, therefore, it has been ably argued for the plaintiff, that it was necessary for the dismissal to be traced to that cause, yet, as I think the existence of the justification sufficient, whether that was or was not the motive of the dismissal, I hold that the plaintiff has incapacitated himself from complaining, and that the rule for a non-suit must be made absolute.

LITLEDALE J. I think the plaintiff can recover nothing. The question was put to the jury, whether his making the entry of his protest was a sufficient ground of dismissal, and they found that it was. Then, there being a sufficient ground, the counsel for the plaintiff say that such a cause will not justify the dismissal, unless acted upon in fact. It seems to me that the law is otherwise. It is sufficient if the cause exist: the plaintiff is not entitled to object that that is not the cause for which he was dismissed. Again, if his dismissal be justifiable for his misconduct, he cannot recover any of the current salary. I need not, therefore, discuss the question of variance; but, if it were necessary, I should say, that the fact of quarterly payments was sufficient to warrant a jury in inferring that an agreement for a salary, to be paid quarterly, took place after the minute was made.

PATTERSON J. If it were necessary to decide upon the ground of variance, I should say that there was none. I think the contract for quarterly payment may be presumed on these facts. But the other ground renders it unnecessary to determine this question. The jury found that there was a sufficient cause for dismissal existing in fact. Neither the Court nor the jury can discuss the ultimate motive. If a justifying cause exist, the master may assign it, whenever the action is brought; and whether any other cause exist, is not material. It may be that a master dislikes a servant, and chooses to take advantage of some improper act. It was put, at one time, as if the cause arose after the dismissal; but that was not the fact. The plaintiff himself sends out the notice for the meeting of the 17th, and he enters his protest, as clerk. He was, therefore, by his own shewing, clerk on the 11th of April. By his own act, he gives the defendants the power of displacing him, if they had it not before. If we were to hold that it was necessary to trace the dismissal to the act which is to justify it, it would follow that a master, who had made up his mind to dismiss a servant, would give the servant, if he discovered his master's intention, licence to act just as he pleased afterwards. We cannot dive into the meaning of parties. If the cause exist, and the master know of it (for on this occasion we need go no further than that), it is a good ground for the dismissal.

COLERIDGE J. This rule for a nonsuit was obtained on three grounds. The first was, that of variance; and I agree that the application must have prevailed if there had been one: but there was abundant evidence to support the statement in the declaration. The second ground was, that the action was misconceived, and that the declaration should have contained a special count for discharging the plaintiff from the service. If it were necessary, I should have wished for time to consider how far this question is determined by the doctrine laid down by Lord Tenterden in Archard v. Hornor (a). But that need not be discussed, if the third ground urged for the nonsuit be tenable; and I think it is. Although a party be hired for a given time, the master is justified in dismissing him for misconduct, and in that case he cannot recover pro rata. As to the existence of a sufficient cause, the jury have found it; and they were right in so doing. The act of entering the protest on the minute book was inconsistent with his service; a servant of this kind, if allowed to do such acts, would be useless. But then it is said that it should have been put to the jury, whether this cause was the operating motive for the dismissal. I own that I was impressed for a considerable time with the weight of this argument. But I think that when a master, sued for wages, defends himself upon the ground that he had dismissed the servant, and that there was in fact something which justified the dismissal, that presents an intelligible issue to a jury: whereas, if the inquiry were to be, whether this justifying cause operated in the master's mind, a jury, in the great majority of cases, could not pronounce a satisfactory verdict. I think it is enough to shew a justification existing in point of fact.

LEMPRIERE against HUMPHREY.*Wednesday,
May 6th.*

TRESPASS for breaking and entering plaintiff's close, described in the declaration as "abutting on the south towards a certain highway in the parish of Hurstperpoint, in the county of Sussex; towards the north on certain land; on the east on premises in the occupation of plaintiff; and on the west towards certain premises in the occupation of the defendant, and situate in the county aforesaid." Plea, that the said close in which &c., was, and from time immemorial has been, within and parcel of the manor of Hurstperpoint in the county of Sussex, and a customary tenement of that manor, demised and demisable by copy of the court rolls in fee-simple or otherwise, at the will of the lord, according to the custom, &c.: the plea then went on to state a grant by copy of court roll, to the defendant, of the close in question, his entry, and that he thereby became seised in fee; and it justified the alleged trespass in respect of such grant and seisin. Replication, traversing that the close in question was parcel of the manor of Hurstperpoint: and issue thereon.

At the trial before Littledale J., at the summer assizes for Sussex, 1834, the defendant's counsel objected, before any evidence was given, to the description of the abutments in the declaration; but the learned Judge permitted the trial to proceed, giving leave to the defendant to move ments could not be objected to, on the trial, as insufficient in itself.

Declaration, in trespass, described the locus in quo by abutments on the north, east, south, and west, severally; and it was said to abut, on the south and west, "towards" certain places named. The defendant pleaded only a justification, in respect of his seisin of the locus in quo which he averred to be parcel of the manor of H., and to have been demised to him by copy of court roll. The plaintiff denied that it was parcel, &c. On the trial, the plaintiff applied his evidence to a triangular piece of land, not contiguous on all sides to the places mentioned in the abutments, but situated within their limits:

Held, first, that the statement of abut-

Secondly, that the plaintiff might apply it, though not with strict correctness, to the triangular piece of land.

to enter a nonsuit. The defendant proved that he held of the lord of the manor of Hurstperpoint a customary tenement called The Reeves, to which the description of the close set out by the plaintiff was applicable. Contradictory evidence (of acts of ownership, &c.) was given, on the following question; viz., whether The Reeves comprehended a triangular portion of ground, to which, taken by itself, the statement of abutments, as far as it went, was applicable as well as to the larger close; there being, in fact, within the abutments mentioned in the declaration, two contiguous portions of land, of which the triangular piece was one: but this latter piece was not actually contiguous, on all sides, to the places mentioned in the description of abutments, neither was The Reeves so contiguous on all sides, unless it comprehended this portion: but, if it did, it was actually bounded on all sides by the abutments mentioned in the declaration (a). The learned judge directed the jury to find for the plaintiff, if they thought that the triangular portion of ground, as to which the contradictory evidence had been given, was not shewn to be a part of the customary tenement. Verdict for the plaintiff. In Michaelmas term last, Platt obtained a rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a nonsuit entered.

Thesiger now shewed cause. The general issue not being pleaded, no objection to the abutments can be raised. There is no doubt of the identity: all the evidence was applicable to it. The plea admits the correctness of the abutments. [Patteson J. The words "abutting towards" are perfect nonsense: the place mentioned might be thirty miles from the locus in quo. "Abutting upon" would be a different thing.] The defendant is not now at liberty to raise this question. By his plea he admits that he understands the declaration sufficiently to plead to it; but at the trial, for the first time, he makes the objection. The word "towards" is not very definite: yet abutments are not to be construed with great strictness. Thus Heath J., in Roberts v. Karr (a), said that, if premises be described as abutting on a house to the east, it may be the north-east or south-east. Under the new rules, Pleadings in particular actions, V. 1. (b), the defendant, if dissatisfied with the statement of abutments in the declaration, should have demurred: or he might have applied to a judge. If it be objected that the defendant was not prepared to meet the evidence relating to the portion claimed by the plaintiff, Cocker v. Crompton (c) shews that the defendant could not have established a defence by shewing his title to another close, which would answer to

(a) 1 Taunt. 501.(b) 5 B. & Ad. ix.(c) 1 B. & C. 489.

1835. the description given in the declaration. Here both parties fully understood what they came to try.

LEMPRIERE
HUMPHREY.

Platt and Hollist, contra. The question raised upon the pleadings, and that which alone the defendant came prepared to try, was, whether certain land was copyhold or not. The abutments set out, if they amount to a statement of abutments at all, applied to a close of the defendant, forming part of The Reeves, his copyhold; and he justified the alleged trespass accordingly. The spot to which the plaintiff applied his evidence is a portion adjoining to that admitted to belong to the defendant. The abutments, which manifestly refer to four sides, are inapplicable to a triangular piece of ground. The real abutments might have been given clearly and precisely. The plaintiff, therefore, cannot contend that "abutting towards," which might equally apply to a place many miles distant, is a sufficient description at all. In Cocker v. Crompton (a) the plaintiff named his close; and the defendant, therefore, though he likewise had a close of the same name in the same parish, must have known which of the two closes the plaintiff meant.

Lord DENMAN C. J. The abutments given are by no means satisfactory. The defendant, however, goes to trial, and claims to shew that the description in the plaintiff's declaration applies to land of him, the defendant; and he proves that a customary tenement, capable of a similar description, belongs to him. I think that, under the new rules, the defendant, if he does not demur, is bound by the description he has adopted,

adopted, and with respect to which he feels certainty sufficient to enable him to plead a justification of the alleged trespass: and Cocker v. Crompton (a) shews that, under the old practice (which as to this point is not disturbed by the later rules), the defendant is precluded from applying the plaintiff's complaint to another close, answering the description in the declaration.

LEMPRIERE
HUMPHREY.

LITLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion. Suppose the defendant had land, bounded on the north by arable land, belonging to A.; on the east by meadow, belonging to B.; on the south by pasture, belonging to C.; and on the west by wood, belonging to D. If the locus in quo, as described in the declaration, had exactly corresponded with this, and the defendant had pleaded as he has done in this case, and had gone to trial in this state of things, and the plaintiff, at the trial, had given evidence respecting another close, to which the description applied, as well as to the close of the defendant, the rule in Cocker v. Crompton (a) would have prevented the defendant from applying the complaint to his own close. This is however, rather a different case; for it seems that the plaintiff's close, being triangular, does not quite answer to the description. But the defendant must be taken to have admitted that the plaintiff was in possession of such a close as that described in the declaration; and, if the plaintiff proves a trespass on such a close, he is entitled to recover.

PATTESON J. On the authority of Cocker v. Crompton (a) I think the plaintiff entitled to recover. I am not sure that he has not succeeded from a cause which ought rather to have operated against him;—I mean the use of the absurd words "abutting towards," to which the defendant ought to have objected at the proper time. The defendant might have had a better description given, by applying to a Judge: but he has adopted this. The close certainly does abut towards the places mentioned, though it is a very improper description. It is true that the piece of ground in question could not have four sides; but we know, from the authority cited by Mr. Thesiger, that abutments are not to be construed very strictly. The literal description applies to both closes. If the description had been abutting upon, and the defendant had traversed the possession, the plaintiff must have failed; but on a traverse of possession, as the declaration now stands, I do not know that there would have been a variance. Here the defendant in fact says, the close which you have described in your declaration is my soil and freehold. Cocker v. Crompton (a) therefore applies. The plea of liberum tenementum does not admit a right of possession; but it admits the fact of possession, though wrongful, of the close described in the declaration.

COLERIDGE J. Cocker v. Crompton (a) governs this case. The principle there established has since been acted upon in Cooke v. Jackson (b), which is rather more applicable to the present facts. Each party there had a close of the name stated in the declaration: so far the case was the same as Cocker v. Crompton (a). But they were parts of the same district, which brings the case nearer to the present. It was attempted to distinguish the case from Cocker v. Crompton (a); but Lord Tenterden said, "Here the plaintiff has a part of the district called Broadmead, and he has a right to call his close by the name of Broadmead. The defendant also has a close called Broadmead in the same district, and he also has a right to call his close by that name; but that will not prevent the plaintiff without a new assignment from going into evidence to shew that the two closes are not connected one with another." If the plaintiff give an accurate description by name, the defendant is not to put him to inconvenience by pleading liberum tenementum. Then what difference does it make, that the description is accurately given by abuttals, and not by name? If, therefore, this were an accurate description by abuttals, there could be no question. But the defendant says, it is inaccurate. We cannot, however, try the question of accuracy between the parties, as they are now placed. The defendant cannot deny the plaintiff's possession, as described. To-day he says, that the abuttals did not give him full information: on the record he says, that close is parcel, &c. He cannot then deny the correctness of the description: he is in the same situation as if it were accurate; and the same consequences must follow.

Lessor of the plaintiff being in possession of a house and premises, defendant asked leave to get vegetables in the garden; and, having obtained the keys for this purpose, fraudulently took possession of the house, and set up a claim of title: Held that, having entered by leave of the party in possession, she could not defend an ejectment, but was bound to deliver up the premises before she proceeded to contest the title.

A mere licensee is, in this respect, on the same footing as a tenant.

peared to be as follows. The lessor of the plaintiff was the widow of one Johnson, who, in 1815, took a piece of land belonging (according to the plaintiff's case) to W.S. Poyntz, Esquire, and built a house upon it, which he occupied for some time and then left. It was afterwards occupied by other persons, and then Johnson, about a year before his death, returned to it, with his wife, the lessor of the plaintiff, and held it till 1832, when he died. The widow remained in the house till November 1832, when she quitted it, putting up a notice that the premises were to let, with a reference to one Mary Batscomb, with whom she left the keys, in order that the house might be shewn to any person applying to see it. The defendant, Johnson's daughter by a former wife, lived in the neighbourhood, and sometimes asked leave of Mary Batscomb to get vegetables from the garden, which she permitted her to do, and for that purpose lent her the key of the garden, having the key of the house tied to it. One day in March 1833, the defendant obtained the keys in this manner, to get vegetables, but returned to Mary Batscomb in the course of the day, and told her that she had not brought back the keys, as she was going to open the house to air it, and should make a fire in it, and sleep there all night. Mary Batscomb remonstrated, and demanded the keys back; but the defendant kept them, moved her goods into the house, and retained possession. In May following, Mr. Poyntz granted a lease of the premises in question to the lessor of the plaintiff; a lease to the husband having been prepared for execution in his lifetime, but never executed. The defence was, that the house had been Johnson's own; that Mr. Poyntz had no right to grant a lease of it; and that Johnson's widow shewed shewed no title, there being no will produced. Little-dale J. left the case to the jury upon the question of title, and they found for the defendant. The learned Judge then, at the instance of the plaintiff's counsel, who cited Doe dem. Hughes v. Dyeball (a), asked the jury whether they thought that the possession had been obtained fraudulently or not; and they found "that the possession was fraudulently obtained, under colour of going to collect vegetables." Leave was given to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, and a rule nisi was granted in last Michaelmas term.

Platt now shewed cause. The jury have, in effect, found that the lessor of the plaintiff had no title. Then the question as to the alleged fraud is as if a man had wrongfully obtained the goods of another, and the owner, by a false representation, got them back again. He might say, "I have recovered my property, and will keep it:" and the wrongdoer could not maintain trover. Here, the lessor of the plaintiff herself committed a fraud in obtaining a lease of premises to which she had no title, for the purpose of this action. [Patterson J. referred to Doe dem. Bullen v. Mills (b), and Lord Denman C. J. to Doe dem. Knight v. Lady Smythe (c), on the authority of which the preceding case was decided.] In each of those cases, the party coming in had assumed to take a legal interest from the lessor of the plaintiff or some one holding under him. Thesiger, contra, mentioned an action of trover tried before Lord Tenterden, where a person had got possession of title-deeds for a particular purpose, and then refused to deliver them up, alleging title in himself, but Lord Tenterden said that, having been obtained by fraud, they must be restored. He was then stopped by the Court.

JOHNSON
BATTUR.

LORD DENMAN C. J. The rule must be made absolute. In this transaction the defendant waived any title which she might previously have been able to assert. She held possession through a licence, whether for a longer or a shorter time is immaterial. She cannot claim against the party by whom she was let in; that party, as between them, has the title. And this is more especially the case where possession has been obtained through fraud, by an opportunity which accident has given.

LITLEDALE J. Possession having been fraudulently obtained, if the title is to be disputed, the lessor of the plaintiff may insist upon being first put into the situation in which she was before the possession was taken.

PATTESON J. In the case of a person who has become tenant, there is no doubt as to the law. Doe dem. Knight v. Lady Smythe (a) shews that he must first give up possession to the party by whom he was let in, and then, if he, or any one claiming by him, has a title aliunde, that title may be tried by ejectment. It was held in that case, not that the party claiming as landlady to the tenant was altogether estopped from trying the right, but that the tenant must first restore possession. If the defendant here has any right, she might, in the first instance, have brought ejectment; or have entered on Mrs. Johnson and disseised her, and maintained the possession. But she takes neither course. She fraudulently obtains permission to go upon the premises, and then turns upon the lessor of the plaintiff, and insists upon holding the land. The rule, as to claiming title, which applies to the case of a tenant, extends also to that of a person coming in by permission as a mere lodger, or as a servant. On this ground I think that a verdict ought to be entered for the plaintiff.

COLERIDGE J. It is best for the interests of justice that the rights of parties should be disputed in a fair and regular way. There is no distinction between the case of a tenant and that of a common licensee. The licensee, by asking permission, admits that there is a title in the landlord. Suppose that under the license an undisturbed possession were enjoyed for some considerable time, and an action were brought for use and occupation; — could the licensee dispute the licensor's right of action? The law would imply a tenancy under such circumstances. Then, if there be no distinction between the cases of a licensee and a tenant, do the circumstances here present an irresistible case of license? Here is a party quietly in possession. The defendant comes and asks for the key. If she had intended to make a claim of title, she might have come as a trespasser to disseise, and, having entered, might have have stood upon her right. But here that was not done; and under the circumstances of this case, the defendant, before she could dispute the title, was bound to put the lessor of the plaintiff in the situation in which she stood before the leave was granted.

ASSUMPSIT by indorsee against drawer of a bill of exchange, averring in the usual form, presentment to the drawee, nonpayment by him, and notice to the defendant. Plea, that the defendant had not due notice of nonpayment by the drawee, tendering issue thereupon. Joinder. On the trial before Tindal C. J., at the Guildford Summer assizes, 1834, it appeared that the plaintiff had indorsed the bill, before it was due, to one Wiltshire, who left it with the plaintiff's clerk in order that it might be presented at maturity to the drawee. It was dishonoured upon presentment, whereupon the plaintiff's clerk gave notice to the defendant; the notice was regular in all respects, except that the clerk gave it in the name of the plaintiff, the indorsee, and not of Wiltshire. The plaintiff afterwards took up the bill from Wiltshire. It was objected that notice ought to have been given by the holder of the bill, whereas the holder, at the time of the notice, was Wiltshire. His Lordship, being of this opinion, nonsuited the plaintiff. In Michaelmas term last, Law obtained a rule to shew cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside, and a verdict be entered for the plaintiff.

The holder of a bill is entitled to avail himself of notice of dishonour given by any party to the bill.

Thesiger and Platt shewed cause (May 6th) (a). In Tindal v. Brown (b) it was held, that notice of dishonour must be given by the actual holder; and the reason is, that the party to whom the notice is given ought to know where the bill is, that he may take it up; and he is entitled to warning that the holder looks to him. Lord Eldon laid down the same rule in Ex parte Barclay (c). The decisions in Hartley v. Case (d), and Solarte v. Palmer (e), which establish that information of the fact of dishonour must be given in the notice, shew the importance of the rule, that the party, in whose hands the bill was when dishonoured, should be the party to give the notice. In Stewart v. Kennett (g) Lord Ellenborough ruled to that effect. His words are, "the notice must come from the person who can give the drawer or indorser his immediate remedy upon the bill; otherwise it is merely an historical fact." It is true that, in Rosher v. Kieran (h), it was held that notice by the acceptor to the drawer was enough; and, in Jameson v. Swinton (i), and Wilson v. Swabey (k), it was ruled, at nisi prius, that notice by any party to a bill was sufficient; but it appears that no reference was made, at the time of these decisions, to the earlier authorities. In Gunson v. Metz (l) the defendant was not proved to have had any notice, except from a party not then holding, and he was considered nevertheless to be liable: but there the defect was supplied by proof of an agreement on the part of the defendant, which amounted to an admission of his liability, and was considered evidence of due notice having been given. If the notice here was good in favour of the plaintiff, Wiltshire, on the same principle, may avail himself of it, and sue upon the same bill. A party is not liable to be sued till he has had the opportunity of paying; and, for this purpose, he ought to have notice from the party to whom he is to pay. It may be observed, that in Jameson v. Swinton (a) the defendant, as Lawrence J. puts it, was enabled to take up the bill if he pleased. So in Rosher v. Kieran (b) the notice stated where the bill was.

Adolphus, contra. The decisions are certainly inconsistent; and it will be necessary for the Court to elect between the two doctrines which have been laid down. Stewart v. Kennett (c), however, does not make against the plaintiff; for there the notice was given by a person not connected with any party to the bill; and all that is contended for by the present plaintiff is, that a notice by any party to the bill is sufficient. And this is the principle laid down in Jameson v. Swinton (a), and Wilson v. Swabey (d). The object of the notice may be considered to be, that the party receiving it may withdraw his effects from the hands of the party who has refused payment. upon the party receiving notice, is mentioned; but the author afterwards says (a), "However, according to the more recent decisions, it is not absolutely necessary that the notice should come from the person who holds the bill when it has been dishonoured, and it suffices if it be given after the bill was dishonoured, by any person who is a party to the bill, or who would, on the same being returned to him, and after paying it, be entitled to require reimbursement, and such notice will, in general, enure to the benefit of all the antecedent parties, and render a further notice from any of those parties unnecessary, because it makes no difference who gives the information, since the object of the notice is, that the parties may have recourse to the acceptor:" and Shaw v. Croft is cited from a MS. note. [Lord Denman C. J. Mr. Justice Bayley says (b), that it is "prudent in each party who receives a notice, to give immediate notice to those parties against whom he may have right to claim; for, the holder may have omitted notice to some of them."]

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.

On the trial of this action by the indorsee against the drawer of a bill of exchange, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas directed a nonsuit, for want of due notice of dishonour. The bill had been indorsed by the plaintiff, by the desire of Wiltshire, who had discounted it, and left it in the hands of the plaintiff's clerk, with instructions to obtain payment, or give notice of dishonour. He did give notice to the defendant, but in the name of the plaintiff, not in that of Wiltshire, the then holder, who had deposited the bill with him.

The objection to the plaintiff's recovery was founded on the case of Tindal v. Brown (a), in which all the Judges of this Court, except Lord Mansfield, considered a notice given by one who was not the holder as no notice, on the ground that the drawer was not thereby apprised of the holder's intention to look to him for payment; and this case was distinctly recognized, and its principle adopted, by Lord Eldon, in Ex parte Barclay (b).

Notwithstanding these high authorities, it is clear, from Jameson v. Swinton (c), Wilson v. Swabey (d), and also from the learned treatises on bills of exchange, that the contrary doctrine has prevailed in the profession, and we must presume a contrary practice in the commercial world. It is universally considered that the party entitled as holder to sue upon the bill may avail himself of notice given in due time by any party to it. In the Nisi Prius cases just referred to, no express allusion was made to Tindal v. Brown (a), or Ex parte Barclay (b), but we can hardly conceive that they were not present to the recollection of Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Lawrence, or the counsel engaged. These learned Judges, indeed, decided them at Nisi Prius, but without question. We are now compelled to determine whether the case of Tindal v. Brown (a), as to this point, be good law. We think that it is not. If it were, the holder might secure his own right against his immediate indorser by regular notice; but the latter, and every other party to the bill, would be deprived of all remedy against anterior indorsers and the drawer, unless each of those parties should in succession take up the bill immediately on receiving notice of dishonour, a supposition which cannot be reasonably made. We may add that this point was not necessary for the decision of the case, as this Court, including Lord Mansfield, granted a new trial on a different ground.

MADDOCK, Executor of HOWELL, against PHILLIPS.

In an action brought by an executor, if the defendant has obtained a verdict, and the Judge who tried the cause has, upon summons, but without hearing any affidavit, certified to deprive the defendant of costs under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 31. the Court will not review his order.

Quære, whether they have authority to do so.

DEBT by executor, in right of his testator, for money lent. The cause was tried at the last Spring assizes for Pembrokeshire, before Williams J., and the defendant had a verdict. At the same assizes, the plaintiff applied to the learned Judge for an order to exempt him from paying costs, under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 31. Williams J. refused to grant the order then, saying that it need not be done at the assizes; and in the ensuing term a summons was taken out by the plaintiff to shew cause why a certificate should not be granted to deprive the defendant of costs. At the hearing before Williams J. no affidavit was produced on behalf of the plaintiff. The defendant's attorney contended that the application ought to be made to the Court, and, at all events, that it should be supported by some specific statement on affidavit. The learned Judge took time to read over his notes, and, on a subsequent day, certified without any further hearing.

Chilton

Chilton now moved for a rule to shew cause why the certificate should not be set aside. Since the statute, executors are liable to costs unless they shew some special ground for exemption; Southgate v. Crowley (a): and that ought to appear by affidavit. It cannot have been intended that this question should be decided by the Judge's notes.

LORD DENMAN C. J. I think the rule ought not to be granted. The act says that the executor shall be liable to costs, "unless the Court in which such action is brought, or a Judge of any of the said superior Courts, shall otherwise order." In Southgate v. Crowley (a) the application was made to the Court of Common Pleas, and they exercised their discretion; in the present case a Judge has been applied to, who has exercised his, with full knowledge of the facts. Unless he had been deceived, I do not know that he could himself discharge the order.

LITTTLEDALE J. This is not an application to set aside the order of a Judge acting merely as a part of the Court. The statute gives the Judge an authority of his own, and here he has exercised it, according to his discretion. I think there should be no rule.

PATTESON J. concurred.

COLERIDGE J. I do not know what power the Court has to grant this rule, more than to review the certificate of a Judge at Nisi Prius for a special jury. Suppose the statute had said nothing of an order to be made by

BOODLE against DAVIES.

Under the Rule of Court, Easter T., 2 G. 4., it is not sufficient to state in the rule nisi for setting aside an award, "that the arbitrator has exceeded his authority;" at least if there be no affidavit stating the particular excess. It must be shewn how the authority has been exceeded.

By an agreement of reference, reciting (among other matters of dispute) that there was a controversy between B. and D. respecting the property in a certain pump, and the right to use it, and also respecting the alleged removal by D. of a boundary hedge between his lands and those of B.; and reciting further, that B. had commenced an action against D. for alleged trespasses upon the said pump and hedge; the cause and all matters in difference were referred to an arbitrator, who was empowered to award how and by whom the said pump and hedge, and the ditch adjoining the said hedge, should in future be enjoyed and occupied, "and who should have the care and management thereof."

The arbitrator awarded that B. was entitled to the pump as his sole and exclusive property, except that D. was entitled to the free use of water from it, in common with B. In a subsequent part of the award he directed that the pump should in future be considered as belonging jointly to B. and D., and be repaired at their joint expense. He further awarded, that the hedge should be kept in repair by D., who should be at liberty to use the mud of the ditch for repairing the hedge bank, but not otherwise; and that, subject to such privilege, the ditch should be considered as the property of B.:

Held, that the award, as to the property in, and use of, the pump, was sufficiently certain and final. And that the directions as to repairs were not an excess of the arbitrator's authority.

Where a cause and all matters in difference are referred to arbitration, with a direction that the costs of the action, reference, and award, shall abide the event of such award, and be paid at such time as the arbitrator shall direct, and the arbitrator awards some things in favour of each party, so that the court cannot say upon the whole that the award is in favour of either, no order can be made as to any part of the costs; although the action was in trespass, and the arbitrator finds that trespasses were committed.

THE above-named parties entered into an agreement of reference, with a recital (in substance) as follows:—

That Boodle was the owner and occupier of a messuage and lands, situate, &c., and Davies the owner and occupier of a messuage adjoining Boodle's. That there was a yard or passage between the two houses, the entrance to which was closed up by a door, and in which yard and passage were a pump, brew-house, and oven, and below or at the end of which yard was a crooked hedge and ditch dividing the lands of the parties from each other. That Davies was alleged to have erected a wall on part of the said passage or yard, a former wall so erected by him having been thrown down by Boodle, and that the bricks of such former wall still remained in the passage. That Boodle had fastened up the said pump with a chain, which Davies had broken after receiving notice not to do so, nor to go to the said pump. That Boodle also charged Davies with having injured a foundation stone of his dwelling house by placing a post of the said door upon it. That Boodle alleged himself to be possessed of or entitled to the said passage, yard, pump, brewhouse, and oven, and the land on which the said wall was erected, as his sole, entire, and exclusive property, and to have a right of free ingress and egress into and out of the said yard at his pleasure. That Boodle charged Davies with having at different times removed the said hedge nearer to Boodle's lands; and that he denied any right in Davies to break the said chain, to take water from the pump after notice, to remove the hedge, or to do the other acts complained of. That Davies denied having committed any trespass, or given any ground of complaint. That Boodle had commenced an action against Davies for the alleged trespasses, to which action Davies had appeared, but no declaration had yet been delivered. And that to settle the said matters in difference, and on account of which the said action had been commenced, the said parties had agreed to a reference as after mentioned. It was then witnessed, among other things, that the parties agreed to abide by the award of an arbitrator, who was named, "of and concerning the premises so in dispute as aforesaid, or any thing in any wise relating thereto; and also of and concerning all" actions, suits, trespasses, damages, and demands, &c., up to and upon the day of the date of the said agreement had, made, commenced, &c., &c., between the said parties, “and in particular of and concerning the said cause or suit now depending between the said John Boodle and Roger Ward Davies in the Court of King’s Bench as aforesaid, and all other matters in difference between them, up to the day” last mentioned. And it was agreed that the arbitrator should have power in and by his said award to state “how and by whom and in what manner the said passage or yard, pump and doorway, hedge and ditch shall in future be enjoyed and occupied, and who shall have the care and management thereof:” and that if he should find that any matter complained of had been illegally erected, placed, or continued, he should and might award when and how the same should be abated, &c. “And also that all the costs and charges of the said action, and of these presents, and the said reference and award, and all other matters in any wise relating thereto, shall abide the event of the said award, and be paid at such time or times as the said arbitrator shall in and by such award direct.” The submission was made a rule of Court.

The arbitrator made his award, by which, after directing that proceedings in the cause should cease, he awarded that Boodle was possessed of or entitled to the said passage, yard, pump, brewhouse, and oven, and to the land on which the said wall was erected, up to a certain stile, “as his sole, entire, and exclusive property; except that the said R. W. Davies has a right to the free use of water from the said pump, in common with the said John Boodle, and of ingress and regress into and out of the said yard by and over the said stile, for the purpose of fetching such water therefrom. And I also award and adjudge that the said

John

John Boodle has a right to have free ingress and regress into and out of the said yard or passage at his free will and pleasure." He then proceeded to award that Davies had committed trespass on Boodle's land in respect of some of the matters complained of in the action; but he added, "I also award and adjudge that the said R. W. Davies has not removed the said crooked hedge into or nearer to the lands of the said J. Boodle than it formerly was, and that he had a right to break the chain so placed round the said pump as aforesaid, and to take away water from the same. And in further exercise of the several powers," &c., "I hereby award and declare that the said pump shall in future be considered as belonging jointly to the said J. Boodle and R. W. Davies, and be repaired at their joint expense; and the said R. W. Davies, his heirs, and assigns, shall have free ingress and regress into and out of the said yard by and over the said stile for the purpose of fetching and carrying away water therefrom." The arbitrator then directed that the boundary between the properties should remain as it was at present, and that Davies should not be interrupted in the use of the said wall, but that the same, and the land whereon it stood, should "be considered as his absolute and exclusive property." And he continued,— "I further award that, with the exception lastly hereinbefore mentioned," (of the said wall) "the said yard shall be enjoyed by the said J. Boodle as his absolute and exclusive freehold property, and that the said hedge shall be kept in repair by the said R. W. Davies, who shall be at liberty to make use of the mud in the ditch adjoining for the purpose of repairing the hedge bank, but not further or otherwise, and, subject to the exercise ercise of such privilege, the said ditch shall be considered as the property of the said J. Boodle, who shall be at liberty to carry away the mud therefrom as he may think proper." The arbitrator then gave directions for removing the bricks of the former wall, and he finally awarded as follows: — "I hereby further award and direct that my costs and charges of attending the said reference and of this my award, amounting to the sum of 12*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.*, shall be paid by the said R. W. Davies, and that all the costs and charges of the said action, of the said recited agreement, of the said reference, and of all other matters in anywise relating thereto, all which said costs and charges are by the said agreement directed to abide the event of this my award, to be taxed and allowed as between party and party, shall also be paid by the said R. W. Davies to the said J. Boodle," at &c., on &c.

In Michaelmas term 1834, a rule nisi was obtained, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the award should not be set aside, on the following grounds:

"That the arbitrator has exceeded his authority. That the said award is uncertain, and not final. That the arbitrator has awarded that the pump was to be considered as belonging to plaintiff and defendant jointly; and that he has also awarded that the said pump belongs to and is the property of the plaintiff. And also for that the arbitrator has not awarded in pursuance of the said reference the payment of the costs of the action."

Sir W. W. Follett and Wightman now shewed cause. First, it is not sufficient, within the rule of Court, Easter

*Easter term, 2 G. 4. (a), to state as an objection to the award, upon the rule nisi, "that the arbitrator has exceeded his authority." It should be shewn how he has done so. In Rawsthorn v. Arnold (b), where the statement of objection in the rule was general, Lord Tenterden held that it was aided by an affidavit put in in support of it; but here no affidavit is made, and the statement in the rule conveys no information. [Lord Denman C. J. In reading an award, very different objections may suggest themselves to different minds. A party supporting an award against such a rule as this might raise some objections which had not been thought of by the opposite side]. Independently of this defect in the rule, the award is good. In effect, it finds the pump to be the exclusive property of Boodle, subject to a right of user by Davies. [Patteson J. If the arbitrator meant to dispose of the property, and not merely to give an easement, there would be, so far, an excess of authority.] The words, "that the said pump shall in future, be considered as belonging jointly to the said J. Boodle and R. W. Davies, and shall be repaired at their joint expense," have not that meaning; and if they had, the parties to whom the award, in that respect, is favourable, have no right to take the objection. And the excess of authority, if any, affects the award only in part. As to costs, the arbitrator was justified in awarding them to the plaintiff. The finding, as to the trespasses, would have entitled him to a verdict in the action; and upon the rest of the matters in dispute, the award, upon the whole, is in the plaintiff's favour.*

 BOODLE

R. V. Richards, contra. The statement in the rule, "that the arbitrator has exceeded his authority," is specific enough. In a rule nisi for a quo warranto, or for setting aside an annuity, the objections are stated with equal generality. Then, as to the other points. Either the award amounts to an adjudication that the pump is the property of both parties, or it directs one to repair the property of the other. Now it cannot be contended that this award creates a tenancy in common; and, if it gives only a right of user to Davies, he cannot do repairs. So also the hedge is clearly the property of Boodle, and there is nothing in the award that can empower Davies to repair it, or to use the mud for that purpose. The words of the agreement of reference do not authorise the arbitrator to give such a power. It is said there, that the arbitrator shall have power to state in his award who shall have "the care and management" of the pump, hedge, and ditch; but those words do not include the liability to repair. Suppose the subject-matter had been a mansion-house, could the burden of repair have been imposed under the words "care and management?" With respect to costs, the arbitrator had no power to award them unless the event of the award was clear; but in this case the matters found in favour of the defendant may be more important than those found against him.

Lord DENMAN C. J. As far as regards costs, we think the defendant is right. As the award is drawn, he may have gained much more by it than the plaintiff; and the agreement of reference makes no provision for costs in the event of an award like the present. On the other points, I am of opinion that no objection is open to the defendant but those which are specifically stated ; for if, under such general words as are first used in this rule, a particular complaint could be introduced, still, when such words are followed by particular words of complaint, the inquiry is narrowed by these. The award that one party is entitled to the pump as his sole property, except that the other has a right to the free use of the water in common with him, and that the pump shall in future be considered as belonging jointly to them, appears contradictory, but is explained by the subsequent direction, that it “ shall be repaired at their joint expense,” which shews that it is meant to belong to them jointly in respect of the doing of repairs (a). It is said that there is an excess of authority in directing one man to repair what is found to be the sole property of another ; but the repair is directed to be done in a particular manner, and I think the words “ care and management,” in the agreement of reference, warrant such a direction as this. The award is said not to be final, but it is so as between these parties, and we do not see that any others are interested. The rule of Court which has been referred to does not mean merely, or at all, that the head of objection should be stated, but that the particular objection should be shewn,—that the arbitrator should be alleged to have improperly done or omitted some particular thing. In the case which was referred to, the Court seems to have thought otherwise ; but I think the proper construction of the rule is as I have stated.

BOODLE

LITTLEDALE J. I think the arbitrator in this case had no power to make the award as to costs, whether the right to them was consistent with his direction or not. As between Boodle and Davies, the award is sufficiently final. As to the adjudication respecting the pump, it is true the award says that Boodle is entitled to it as his sole and exclusive property; but that is subject to an exception, which is, in effect, that Davies has as much right to use it, for the only purpose to which a pump is applicable, as Boodle has. This part explains the former. Then in the subsequent clause the arbitrator says that the said pump shall in future be considered as belonging jointly to the parties, and be repaired at their joint expense. The first part of this direction varies but slightly from that before given; for the arbitrator had already made it almost a joint property, by giving a joint use; and he now further awards (in pursuance of the clause in the agreement of reference enabling him to provide for the care and management of this property), that the repairs shall be done jointly by the two parties. In the subsequent part of the award, as to repairing the hedge, and taking mud from the ditch, the arbitrator's intention is declared in express words. I see no uncertainty; and I think the rule must be absolute as to costs only.

PATTESON J. I am of the same opinion. The form of the reference is singular. Where an action is depending, it is reasonable to provide that the costs shall abide the event; but where all matters in difference are referred, it seems that under such an order as to costs, each party must necessarily pay his own, unless every thing thing is found in favour of one. The provision that the costs shall be paid at such time or times as the arbitrator shall direct, contemplates the event of costs being payable consistently with the other terms of the submission. The arbitrator has thought that the present was such a case, but has been wrong. I hope it will not be taken that we consider objections stated in the general manner which has been pointed out here, to be correctly stated. Rawsthorn v. Arnold (a) is a distinguishable case. There it was stated in the rule that the arbitrator "had not decided all matters in difference;" and the Court seems to have been of opinion that the rule alone would not have been sufficient; but there was an affidavit, of which Lord Tenterden thought that notice might be taken, and the two together held to explain the objection made to the award. Here no such affidavit is made; we have only the rule and the award, and there is nothing to draw our attention to any particular part of the award. I think, therefore, that there is not, in this case, a sufficient statement of the objection; and I hope, in future, it will be considered that a rule of this kind ought to state in what respect the arbitrator has exceeded his authority, and in what respect he has failed to decide all matters submitted. As to the more particular objections in this case, the award is not to be construed as strictly as a deed. The arbitrator had authority to direct "how and by whom, and in what manner," the pump should "be enjoyed and occupied." Having that authority, he awards that the property is in Boodle, but that Davies has an easement, and that such easement shall continue. Then as to the repairs, in respect of which it is said that he has exceeded his authority; the words empowering him to award how the property shall be occupied give him authority to say under what conditions the occupation shall be. The same observations apply to the hedge and ditch; and, if the arbitrator might say how they should be occupied, and who should repair them, he might also direct what should be done with the mud.

COLERIDGE J. I am of the same opinion, and I must express my entire concurrence in the construction which has been given to the rule of Court. The purposes of that rule would be defeated if parties might state a general head of objection, as has been done here, and then go into any number of particular objections which might range themselves under it. As to the specific objections here, it must be considered that we are construing an award, and in doing so regard must be had to the subject-matter. It has been contended that the words "care and occupation" cannot involve repairs; and it has been asked whether such an effect could be given to them in the case of a mansion house; but here, if the subject-matter be looked to, the plaintiff's construction will appear sensible enough.

Rule discharged, except as to so much of the award as directs the payment of costs.

Sir W. W. Follett then called the attention of the Court more particularly to the costs of the action, observing that the matters sued upon had been found in favour of the plaintiff. But,

COOPER against PHILIP THOMAS GARDNER.

Thursday,
May 7th.

THIS was a rule calling on the plaintiff, the defendant, and Frances Hatton, to shew cause why an inquisition taken by the sheriff of Anglesea, under the elegit issued in this cause, should not be set aside. The inquisition stated, that Philip Thomas Gardner on, &c., and on the day of taking the said inquisition, was possessed of the residue of an unexpired term of 500 years, granted March 28th, 1779, of and in certain messuages, tenements, lands, and hereditaments, particularly described, which term was held and possessed by the said P. T. Gardner, as mortgagee, for securing 6000*l.* and interest payable on a day which was past. The inquisition then stated the delivery to the plaintiff of a moiety of the said lands and tenements (being a moiety of the lands and tenements named in the writ of elegit), according to the statute. It appeared by affidavit that the mortgage had been assigned to the Rev. Philip Gardner, the defendant's father, for the residue of the term, to secure 6000*l.* and interest, and that Mr. Gardner, by his will, devised the interest of the 6000*l.* to the defendant for life, and after his decease to trustees for the defendant's sons and daughters. The testator also appointed the defendant and Frances Hatton his executor and executrix; and the will contained a resi-

By inquisition, taken under an elegit, it was stated that G., the defendant, was possessed of a term in lands as mortgagee. The term had been bequeathed by words, upon which a question arose, whether such term were vested in G. or in the executrix. The Court refused to decide, on motion, at the instance of the mortgagor or of the executrix, whether G. had an interest of the nature described in the inquisition, and liable to be extended.

duary clause, which was relied upon in shewing cause, as conveying the principal sum of 6000*l.* to the defendant. The testator died in 1826. Judgment had been signed in this action in 1819. The defendant, on his father's death, renounced execution, and probate was taken out by Frances Hatton. The mortgagor had continued in the receipt of the rents and profits ever since the mortgage was executed. The interest was regularly paid from the time of the testator's decease; and it was suggested in an affidavit, sworn in opposition to the rule, that such interest had been received by the defendant, as the party entitled to the principal. But an affidavit was subsequently filed on the other side (a), denying this, and stating that the interest had been paid to the use of Mrs. Hatton as executrix, and as the party legally interested in the term.

Chilton now shewed cause on behalf of the plaintiff, and contended that the defendant's interest in the premises was such as might be taken under the elegit; but as no judgment was given on this point, the arguments

(a) The rule was obtained in Easter term 1834, and, in the next term (after counsel had been partly heard in opposition), it was enlarged in order that the facts might be turned into a special case. This was not done, and the rule was further enlarged. The affidavit above mentioned was sworn, by the solicitor to Mrs. Hatton, on the 2d of January 1835. Reference being made to it in the course of the argument partly reported above, it was objected that the affidavit came too late, and ought not to be received. Littledale J. On the plea side of the Court, parties shewing cause against a rule are at liberty to file fresh affidavits every time the rule is enlarged. [The officers of the Court stated that it was so on the plea side, though not on the crown side.] Patteson J. Mrs. Hatton is an adverse party to the mortgagor upon this rule, and the affidavit is put in on her behalf.

It was part of the rule of enlargement made in this case in Michaelmas term 1834, "that the affidavits which parties intend to read at the time of shewing cause, be filed one week before the next term."

upon it are omitted. At all events the inquisition cannot be disputed in the present form of proceeding. This is an attempt by the mortgagor to try the debtor's title to the lands in a summary way. He, as a third person, has no right to interpose. Nor is he, in fact, prejudiced. As to legal rights, the elegit only puts the judgment creditor into the situation in which the defendant was before, according to the observation of Gibbs C. J. in his judgment in Rogers v. Pitcher (a); and all the present equities between the mortgagor and mortgagee will still subsist. The finding upon this inquisition has been, that the defendant held and was possessed of the term. The Court is asked to decide summarily that such finding is, in point of fact, untrue; and that at the instance of a party who may be called a stranger. No authority can be shewn for such a course.

The mortgagor and Mrs. Hatton are entitled to contend that an interest such as this, in a mortgage term, cannot be taken under an elegit. [Patteson J. This cannot be any thing more than the case of a sheriff seizing goods of A, under an execution against B. Has the Court ever proceeded summarily upon such a question as that?] In *Harris v. said: "It is clear, in the present case, that the plaintiff was not entitled to the possession of the land, as against the landlord Cresswell; and if so, he could have no claim against the tenant. The inquisition certainly found that Cresswell was seised of the land; but a stranger to the inquisition was not bound to traverse it: he might dispute its correctness in any other way." [Lord Denman C. J. We think it ought to be shewn by some direct authority that the Court has ever taken the course now suggested.] No authority has been found; but there are many analogous instances in which the Court will interfere to relieve the subject where an excess of jurisdiction has been committed; as, for instance, in setting aside orders of justices. [Littledale J. There the orders are brought before the Court by certiorari.] The inquisition here is on the files of the Court. [Lord Denman C. J. Setting aside orders of justices is an exercise of the ancient jurisdiction of the Court. Here we are called upon to do that which properly belongs to others. Patteson J. When orders are brought up by certiorari, the Court does not enquire into matter not appearing upon the orders themselves.] Affidavits have been allowed, to shew that the orders were made without jurisdiction: Rex v. The Justices of the West Riding (a), Rex v. The Justices of Somersetshire (b). Here is an excess of jurisdiction, and an abuse of the process of the Court.

Lord DENMAN C. J. It is not an excess of jurisdiction that is alleged, but a mistake on the merits. That cannot be gone into in the manner proposed.

The KING against The Company of Proprietors of the BRECKNOCK and ABERGAVENNY Canal Navigation.

Friday,
May 8th.

A RULE nisi was obtained for a mandamus to the above-mentioned company to construct and complete the railways, bridges, and other works mentioned in a notice given to them by Richard Summers Harford and others, on the 18th of October 1832. The application was grounded on stat. 33 G. 3. c. 96., "for making and maintaining a navigable canal from the town of Brecknock to the Monmouthshire canal, near the town of Pontypool," &c., "and for making and maintaining railways and stone roads from such canal to several iron-works and mines," &c. By that statute (sect. 1.) the company of proprietors was incorporated and invested with certain powers for the purposes of the act, and, among others, with that of making railways from their own canal to any mines, &c. within eight miles: and by sect. 96., it was further enacted as follows:—

"That if the owner or owners of any manor, estate, or lands containing any mines," &c. "of iron, iron stone, lead, coals, or other minerals, or any quarries," &c.

By an act establishing a canal company, it was provided, that certain land owners might call upon them by notice, as directed in the act, to execute certain works, communicating with the company's canal and railways; and that, if the company should refuse for six months after such request, the applicants might themselves perform the works in the same manner as the company might have done them.

An application being made to the company under this clause, they answered that they would do the works themselves; but they delayed proceeding, and, on remonstrance, gave as a reason, that the proposed operation would interfere with the property of other parties, who were likely, if so disturbed, to bring an action. The company offered nevertheless to proceed if indemnified. The applicants, in answer, stated that they considered the excuse insufficient, and did not understand how they could be expected to indemnify. Six months had at this time elapsed since the original application. The works not being done, a mandamus was applied for: the parties making the present application, required the company by a notice conformable to the act, delivered to them at a meeting of proprietors on the 18th of October 1832, to make certain railways and erect certain bridges in the said notice particularly described, to communicate with certain mines, &c. of the applicants, situate within eight miles of the canal; and the making of which railways and bridges the applicants, as they stated in the notice, deemed expedient and necessary. And the company were, by the said notice, informed that if they should refuse to make and erect the same for the space of six months after the application, the applicants would make and erect them at their own cost under the powers of the act. The company, at their next general meeting, holden in April 1833 (a), passed the following resolution with respect to that part of the notice which it was now sought to enforce by mandamus: — “Resolved, that, with respect to the first application, this company have determined to retain and to exercise their parliamentary powers, and for that purpose the clerk is hereby directed to make the necessary application to the owners and occupiers of land in the line described on Messrs. Harfords’ plan.” A copy of this resolution was sent to Messrs. Harford and Co.

The resolution not being carried into effect, Messrs. Harford and Co. caused a letter to be written upon the subject to the clerk of the company, and were informed by him, in answer, that the company had begun the necessary operations, but found that it would be necessary to cross the rail-road of the Monmouthshire Canal Company, who had warned them against trespassing, and who had already brought an action (still depending) against Messrs. Harford and Co. for crossing the same rail-road (a). The company therefore suggested the propriety of waiting the result of the action, before any further step should be taken. The applicants, in a second letter, denied that the action referred to could determine any thing as to the undertaking now in question, and urged that the works should proceed. The clerk of the company answered as follows: —

“ We understand that a meeting of the canal committee will be held on some day in the present month, when we will submit to them the correspondence which has recently taken place between us on this business. The nature of the notice given by the Monmouthshire Canal Company, leads us to think that the instant we commence operations at the Penmark Colliery, they will institute legal proceedings against us. We therefore take it for granted that your clients will agree to indemnify the Brecknock and Abergavenny Canal Company in respect to all the consequences of those operations.”

To this letter the agent of Messrs. Harford and Co. replied, on the 3d of September 1833: — “ We cannot admit that the notice or apprehension of legal proceedings from the Monmouthshire Canal Company, to which you refer, at all justifies the delay on the part of your clients complained of in our former letter, nor do we understand upon what principle Messrs. Harfords and Co. can be expected to indemnify the Company of proprietors of the Brecknock and Abergavenny Canal Navigation in the exercise by that company, for their own benefit, and by their own election, of the powers conferred upon them by their act of parliament." The works were not proceeded with. In Trinity term, 1834, the rule nisi was obtained for a mandamus.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, and E. V. Williams (with whom was C. Powell), now shewed cause, and contended that the company were not obliged, nor clearly authorized by the act, to cross the Monmouthshire Canal Company's railway. As to the resolution passed upon Messrs. Harford and Co.'s application, it may be said on the other side that, by passing such a vote, the Brecknock and Abergavenny Canal Company have precluded the applicants from making the proposed railways themselves, the act only empowering parties to take such a course upon refusal of the company to do the works required. But if that be so, the proper mode of trying what injury has been sustained would be by an action on the case. And the company are willing to execute the works on receiving an indemnity, or to give a refusal, if that is necessary, to enable the parties to proceed for themselves.

Maule, contra. The company have endeavoured to evade the rights given by this statute to the applicants. At the end of six months from the notice, they were bound either to give a refusal or to perform the works. There has been no refusal, but the company have declared that they would exercise their parliamentary powers. [Lord Denman C. J. purposes of an act, after having given certain notices: the company, having given the notices, cannot retract, but may be obliged by mandamus to complete the purchase (a).] The cases are similar. [Coleridge J. Supposing that the company have lost their right of election, ought not you, for the purpose of obtaining a mandamus, to shew that you have applied to them, since the passing of the resolution, to do these works, and that, on such application, they have refused?] If they were bound to perform the works at all, they were bound to do it within a reasonable time after the resolution. When they passed it, the duty was thrown upon them. Harford and Co. had then a vested right to the performance of the works by the company. Their assent had put it out of the power of Harford and Co. to act for themselves. It is true, they now offer to give a refusal, but that must be on a fresh application under the statute; and the applicants have now lost two years.

LORD DENMAN C. J. This case must go off upon a point not bearing on the merits. The parties making the application do not state anything, subsequent to the resolution in 1833, which carries the refusal of performance farther than a demand of indemnity for the company in case of their doing the works. We cannot grant a mandamus unless there has been a direct refusal; and here, I think, there has not. It is not indeed necessary that the word "refuse," or any equivalent to it, should be used; but there should be enough to shew that the party withholds compliance, and distinctly determines not to do what is required. The question is, as in a case which was lately before us respecting payment of taxes (a), whether the party had done what the Court distinctly sees to be equivalent to a refusal. Here I cannot perceive that in the correspondence and conduct of the company. Their answer to the last application is, that they are ready to do the works, if indemnified. That leaves the case short of the point to which it would have been brought if such an application had been made that any non-performance afterwards must have amounted to a refusal. Messrs. Harford and Co. might have said, "we desire a direct answer, and your not giving it will be considered a refusal." A direct application would probably have led to a direct denial; and that, or something equivalent, should have taken place, to furnish ground for a mandamus.

LITLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary that there should have been a refusal in so many words; but here the Company only answered the application by requiring an indemnity. There should, after that, have been a formal and distinct demand, to warrant this motion.

PATTESON J. I am sorry that the case should go off on this point; but the Canal company had at one time agreed to perform the works, and nothing is shewn which amounts to an express rescinding of that consent. When Harford and Co. declined indemnifying, they should have followed that up by a direct application to have the works done.

In the Matter of Hodgson and Ross.

An attorney who, after being examined, sworn, and admitted, neglects for a year to take out his certificate, is not an unqualified person within stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11.; and, if he practise, without being re-admitted, in the name of another attorney, he is not, therefore, liable to imprisonment, nor the other attorney to be struck off the roll, under that statute; though the latter would be punishable under the general jurisdiction of the Court.

BAINES had obtained two rules in Hilary term last, calling upon Hodgson to shew cause why he should not be committed to the prison of this Court for a period not exceeding one year, and upon Ross, an attorney of this Court, to shew cause why he should not be struck off the roll. The application was grounded on stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11. (a). Hodgson had been admitted an

"be it therefore enacted, that from and after," 29th September 1749, "if any sworn attorney or solicitor shall act as agent for any person or persons, not duly qualified to act as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid, or permit or suffer his name to be any ways made use of upon the account, or for the profit of any unqualified person or persons, or send any process to such unqualified person or persons, thereby to enable him or them to appear, act, or practise in any respect as an attorney or solicitor, knowing him not to be duly qualified as aforesaid, and complaint shall be made thereof an attorney of this Court in 1827, and practised at Gisburne, in Yorkshire, till the year commencing in November 1830; when, being in embarrassed circumstances, he did not take out his certificate. He remained uncertificated for more than a year; and since then, according to the affidavits in support of the rule, he had practised in the name of Ross. In answer, affidavits were filed in which these facts were explained or denied; and, on shewing cause, it was contended that the facts were not such as could warrant the application, even supposing the statute to include the case of an attorney who had omitted to take out his certificate. So much only of the facts and arguments is here reported as relates to the construction of the statute.

In the Matter of
Ross.*

Sir Gregory Lewin for Hodgson, and F. V. Lee for Ross, now shewed cause. The present is not a case within this section of the act, the object of which was to protect the public from the ignorance of unqualified persons, such as have not been examined (as directed by stat. 2 G. 2. c. 23. s. 6.), sworn, and admitted. The renewal of the certificate is merely a fiscal regulation. The enactments providing for the fitness of the attorney belong to a different class of regulations, and are en-thereof in a summary way to the court from whence any such process did issue, and proof made thereof, upon oath, to the satisfaction of the court, that such sworn attorney or solicitor hath offended therein as aforesaid, then, and in such case, every such attorney or solicitor so offending shall be struck off the roll, and for ever after disabled from practising as an attorney or solicitor; and in that case, and upon such complaint and proof made as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said court to commit such unqualified person, so acting or practising as aforesaid, to the prison of the said court, for any time not exceeding one year."

1835. forced by different penalties, as under stat. 3 Ja. 1. c. 7., and stat. 2 G. 2. c. 23., which are continued by later acts. [Coleridge J. You say that, if a person be off the rolls for want of renewing his certificate, he still retains a qualification, though it is suspended. Lord Denman C. J. The words are, not duly qualified to act "as aforesaid."] That means, qualified by having been examined, sworn, and admitted. No case has occurred of applying this section to attorneys who have once been on the rolls. In Re Palmer (a), In Re Clark (b), In Re Jackson and Wood (c), Ex parte Whatton (d), In Re King and Tredwell (e), were all cases in which the unqualified party had never been an attorney at all. [Patteson J. Stat. 37 G. 3. c. 90. s. 31., makes the admission of attorneys, who neglect to renew their certificate, "null and void." Therefore it will be said that Hodgson practised without being admitted.] The first statute which required a certificate was stat. 25 G. 3. c. 80. Till that act passed, there could of course be no attempt to apply stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11. to the case of a party practising without a certificate. Then how can stat. 25 G. 3. c. 80., or stat. 37 G. 3. c. 90., bring such a party within the previous act? The qualification referred to in stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11. could not possibly mean such a qualification as was thereafter to be created; and the later acts contain nothing connecting them with the penalties of the preceding act.

Baines contra. The case falls within the plain words of the section. The admission is null and void by stat.

(a) 2 A. & E. 686. S. C. 1 Harr. 55.

(b) 3 D. & R. 260.

(c) 1 B. & C. 270.

(d) 5 B. & Ald. 824.

(e) 1 A. & E. 560.

37 G. 3. c. 90. s. 31. The party, therefore, is as if he had never been admitted. Then stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11. inflicts the punishment upon persons who practise without possessing the qualification of admission. The penalties in the twelfth section of that act were enforced in a case where the party had not renewed his certificate, in Slack v. Wilkins (a); yet the preamble of that section refers much more distinctly to the danger of unskilfulness, than that of the eleventh section. [Lord DENMAN C. J. The twelfth section contains the words—“unless such person shall continue so entered upon the roll.” There is no such expression in the eleventh.] Lord LYNCH referred expressly to the admission and enrolment being null and void, under the act of 37 G. 3.

In the Matter of Hobson and Rosa.

LORD DENMAN C. J. This rule must be discharged. The conduct of the party is not the conduct contemplated in the eleventh section of stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. The object of that section, and of previous enactments on the same matter, was to prevent unqualified persons from acting. The qualification “as aforesaid,” is the having been examined, sworn, and admitted. Then any attorney who knowingly acts for a person not so qualified incurs the penalty. The qualification includes all the three things, examination, swearing, and admission. This gives rise to an argument founded on stat. 37 G. 3. c. 90. s. 31., which makes the admission null and void where the certificate has not been renewed. The strength of the argument in favour of the rule rests upon this; and certainly a fair doubt does arise upon the word “admission.” Yet, looking at the intent of stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46., which was to secure skill and knowledge on the part of the attorney employed, and recollecting that a punishment is imposed for practising without qualification, we must, I think, control the sense of the word "admission." The object of stat. 37 G. 3. c. 90. was to secure the payment of the stamp duty; and, although the thirty-first section declares the admission null and void, yet we cannot import that enactment into the preceding statute, so as to make the party subject to the punishment imposed on practising without being admitted. We are referred to the interpretation which the Court of Exchequer has put upon the twelfth section of stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46., in Slack v. Wilkins (a). That case was, I think, very properly decided; for the twelfth section imposes the penalty on the person acting, "unless such person shall continue so entered upon the roll;" and the enrolment there was set aside by the thirty-first section of stat. 37 G. 3. c. 90. But in the eleventh section of stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46., no such expression occurs as that in the twelfth; under the eleventh, we have merely to look to the three qualifications. At the same time, I wish to say that it does not follow that, if an attorney once examined, sworn, and admitted, be off the roll, another person can act for him, without being subject to the authority of this Court. An officer of the Court would be made answerable for so acting, and so perhaps would any party. But our general power does not warrant our acceding to the present application.

LITLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion. The object of the eleventh section of stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. is pointed out by the preamble, which adverts to the

practising of persons not examined, sworn, or admitted, by the assistance and connivance of sworn attorneys and solicitors, "to the great prejudice and loss of many of his Majesty's subjects, and the scandal of the profession of the law." The object was to prevent persons who were not regularly qualified "as aforesaid" from practising in the names of regular attorneys. Now Hodgson was duly admitted; and there was therefore one time at which he was not within this section, as an unqualified person. Then the subsequent statute, 37 G. 3. c. 90. s. 31., declares that, if the certificate be not properly renewed, the admission shall be "from thenceforth null and void." The object of that statute was merely the security of the revenue. Yet, if it does, in effect, operate on the provisions of the former act, this application is well founded. But it seems to me that it has no such effect. Though the admission be null and void, the party is not unqualified within the intent of sect. 11. of the former act. The object of that section was to prevent the indirect practice of improper persons; the later act had the revenue only in view. Again, by stat. 37 G. 3. c. 90. s. 31. provision is made for readmitting attorneys who have failed to renew their certificate; and yet the original admission was, under the same act, null and void. But an attorney who allows an unqualified person, within the meaning of stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11., to practise in his name, is for ever after disabled from practising, and incapable of readmission. I think, therefore, that this section does not apply. If, indeed, we found that an attorney knowingly allowed an uncertificated person to practise in his name, we might, by our general power, strike him off the rolls, and, in some way or other, punish the other party also. But this 1835. is not a case within the provisions of the act, although, supposing the offence to be made out, Ross would be liable under our general jurisdiction. The rule must, therefore, be discharged; but, under the particular circumstances, it ought to be discharged without costs.

1835.

PATTERSON J. I confess that it is very difficult to distinguish this case from that of a person struck off the rolls for misconduct; and whether a person so struck off would be within stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11. is difficult to say. The object of this section was not revenue, but the prevention of persons, not qualified by examination, swearing, "or" admission, from practising in the names of others. The being examined and sworn is one part of the qualification. In default of such qualification the attorney acting for, or lending his name to, the unqualified party, is to be struck off the roll, and no discretion is given to the Court. The unqualified person is to be committed to prison. Hodgson had been examined, sworn, and admitted. But his admission has become null and void by his not having renewed his certificate. It is not disputed that he might be readmitted without being again examined or sworn: the readmission always, in such cases, takes place by rule of Court without the personal appearance of the defendant, and no examination is gone through. The provision of 37 G. 3. c. 90., under which the admission is avoided, subject to readmission, is merely a statutory regulation in favour of the revenue. It seems to me, therefore, that the avoidance which it creates does not bring a party within stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11. But I cannot say, generally, that a party once admitted, and struck off the rolls for misconduct, would would not be within that section: perhaps, in such a case, the previous admission might be void for all purposes. I should be sorry that this decision should encourage attorneys to practise for persons not on the rolls: there are many ways in which such a practice might be punished.

In the Matter of Hodgson and
Ross.

COLERIDGE J. The facts alleged in support of this application are, that Hodgson had not renewed his certificate, and was allowed by Ross to practise in his name; and we are called on to say whether we can apply to such a case the provisions of an act passed with a totally different object — the exclusion of persons who were not qualified. The question is, whether the enactment of stat. 37 G. 3. c. 90. s. 31., making void the admission, renders the person “unqualified” under stat. 11 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11., the latter, too, being a penal act, and compelling the Court, without any discretion, to strike off the rolls the attorney offending under that clause. Before applying that act, we ought to be very sure that the case is within it. I look at the preamble of the eleventh section. (His Lordship here read the first part of the section.) It is quite obvious that the persons intended are those who have not gone through the examination: all the terms obviously regard persons unqualified to practise, de facto. Then comes the enactment. (His Lordship then read the enacting part.) It seems to me too much to say that this person, who has been examined, sworn, and admitted, is unqualified. The words “null and void,” which are used in the subsequent statute, must have a limited sense given to them. For, after the penalty is paid, the party is readmitted without being examined, 1835. and, I believe, without being sworn. We should be carrying a penal act much too far if we were to say that such a case was within it.

KITCHENER and Others, Assignees of DEAN, a Bankrupt, against POWER.

Under the Bankrupt Act, 6 G. 4. c. 16. s. 92, the depositions taken before the commissioner are evidence of the petitioning creditor's debt, the trading, and the act of bankruptcy, in an action of trover brought by the assignees, though the declaration states a conversion in the time of the assignees only, if the cause of action be one for which the bankrupt himself might have sued.

For ascertaining whether or not the case is within sect. 92., the criterion is, whether the bankruptcy be only a formal step in the evidence, or whether it be so essentially a part of the ground of action that, without proof of it, no party could recover in respect of the alleged cause.

This is to be decided by the Judge, upon the opening of evidence at the trial.

TROVER for bacon and lard. The declaration contained two counts,—one stating the possession to have been in the bankrupt before, the other in the assignees after, the bankruptcy, but both laying the conversion after the bankruptcy. Plea, the general issue. Notice was given of disputing the petitioning creditor's debt and the act of bankruptcy. On the trial before Lord Denman C. J. at the sittings in London after Hilary term, 1834, the plaintiffs' case was, that the defendant, assuming to be a creditor of the bankrupt, and knowing him to be in insolvent circumstances, had fraudulently contracted for the goods, and obtained them upon the express terms of paying for them in cash, but with the intention of setting off the price against his own demand. And it was contended, for the plaintiffs, that this being a fraud upon the bankrupt, and no contract, he might, but for his bankruptcy, have maintained an action to recover the goods back; and, consequently, that the depositions taken before the commissioners of bankrupt were conclusive evidence of the petitioning creditor's debt and act of bankruptcy, by stat. 6 G. 4. c. 16.

s. 92. (a). On the other hand it was alleged that, as the only conversion in the declaration was laid to have taken place after the bankruptcy, this, upon the face of the record, appeared not to be an action which the bankrupt could have maintained, and, therefore, the depositions were inadmissible. The Lord Chief Justice, upon the authority of Jones v. Fort (b), expressed himself of this opinion, and the plaintiffs, being unable to prove their case without the depositions, were nonsuited. A rule nisi was obtained, in the following term, for a new trial, on account of the rejection of evidence. In Hilary term last,

Sir F. Pollock, Attorney-General, shewed cause (c). The evidence was not admissible, because the action was not one which the bankrupt could have maintained before his bankruptcy. This appears, first by the declaration. The first count states, in effect, that the goods belonged originally to the bankrupt, but now belong to the assignees; and that, since the bankruptcy, the defendant converted them. The conversion is the gist of the action. The second count does not allege any possession by the bankrupt at all. The assignees cannot, after so stating their case, insist that there was a conversion in the bankrupt's time; and, if there was not, sect. 92. of the act does not apply. It is also clear, on referring to the substance of the transaction, that no suit could have been commenced in the time of the bankrupt. This is an attempt to recover back goods obtained under a contract of purchase. The plaintiffs' counsel at the trial compared the case on the defendant's part to that of Major Semple (a); but there was no pretence for calling such a purchase as this a fraud; and, supposing that the assignees were entitled to sue for the purpose of recovering back the goods, they were not bound to do so: they might repudiate the contract or not, and until there had been a distinct repudiation and demand there was no conversion. In the bankrupt's time, at least, there was no repudiation of the contract, and therefore no ground of action. In Smith v. Woodward (b) the intimation of opinion ascribed to the learned Judge is loosely worded; but that case is distinguishable from the present. There, goods had been deposited by the bankrupt with the defendant: he might at any time have demanded them back, and the defendant was always bound to return them. It did not substantially differ from the case of an unpaid balance, not demanded before the bankruptcy, but which nevertheless was money had and received to the use of the bankrupt at that period, and, after the bankruptcy, might be considered as had and received to the use of the assignees. But in this case the transfer of the goods was not a deposit,—it was a matter of contract, till the assignees elected to consider it otherwise; and until then there was no subsisting right to recover the goods back. The case is entirely different from that of a bill of exchange not due, or a credit not expired, at the time of the bankruptcy. Here, inasmuch as the contract was one which the assignees might have confirmed or not, the whole right of action took its rise from a period subsequent to the bankruptcy. In the cases where a cause of action at first imperfect has been made perfect since the bankruptcy, as in Smith v. Woodward (a), or where a bill indorsed to the bankrupt has become due since the bankruptcy, the particular state of facts may be expected to appear on the record. Here the pleadings do not suggest the existence of any ground of action before the bankruptcy. On the face of the declaration it appears that the conversion was subsequent.

Sir W. W. Pollett, Solicitor-General, and Crowder, contra. The action is not grounded upon any repudiation of a contract. The assignees say that there was no contract; that the goods were obtained by fraud, and that no property passed. Section 92. of the Bankrupt Act applies where the right of action is independent of the bankruptcy; but where that right is affected by some altered state of facts consequent upon the bankruptcy, the section is inapplicable. The question in a case like this is, whether the bankrupt himself could have brought the action; not, of course, in the particular form of the then existing record, but in any form which the facts would have warranted? Thus, if goods have been sold at a credit which had not expired at the time of the bankruptcy, the bankrupt, if that event had not happened, might have sued at the expiration of such credit. The case of a bill of exchange not due at the time of the bankruptcy is an instance of the same kind. The words of the section are, "for which the bankrupt might have sustained any action or suit;" that is, if the bankruptcy had not happened. The spirit of the clause is, that, where the assignees do not require the intervention of the bankruptcy to establish their claim, the depositions shall be evidence; the object being, that assignees shall not be vexatiously called upon to go through the several steps of proof relating to the bankruptcy, where the matters to be so proved are not the foundation of their title. In Smith v. Woodward (a) the bankruptcy was not an essential ingredient in the cause of action. The right to bring the action of detinue was not complete before that event; but if the bankrupt had demanded the goods he might have sued. And Patterson J. said, "I think it is not necessary that the 'demand' should have been such as was perfect in the bankrupt at the time of his bankruptcy. The only cases in which it was intended to allow the assignees to be put to strict proof of the bankruptcy, were those in which the bankruptcy was itself almost a part of the cause of action, such as cases of fraudulent preference, or the like. But here it is immaterial whether the bankrupt or the assignee brings the action." Fox v. Mahoney (b) is a direct authority on this point. That was an action in trover, by assignees against a bailee who had converted goods deposited with him by the bankrupt; the bankruptcy was proved by the depositions and proceedings only ; and Lord Lyndhurst C. B. said (referring to 6 G. 4. c. 16. s. 92), " I am of opinion that the intention of the Legislature was, that, in cases where, in the event of there being no bankruptcy, the bankrupt could have maintained an action, and where no such notice as is prescribed in the section has been given, the depositions should be received as conclusive evidence ; and I think so, on the ground stated at the bar, that if the defendant is not bound to pay the assignees, he is bound to pay the bankrupt ; and that, by a subsequent clause in the Act, he is discharged by such payment from any future claim, although the commission should be afterwards superseded." In that case, as in Smith v. Woodward (a), the bankrupt would not have been in a condition to sue unless something had been done which in fact was not done before the bankruptcy ; viz. demanding the goods ; but that was not held to make any difference. [Lord Denman C. J. It does not appear, in Fox v. Mahoney (b), when the conversion was stated to have taken place.] The report shews that the declaration must have laid it in the time of the assignees. It is true that, in Jones v. Fort (c), Lord Tenterden, while he allowed that the proceedings were evidence in actions which the bankrupt might have brought, held them to be evidence on those counts only which laid the conversion in his time ; but the point was not discussed ; the ruling appears to have been acquiesced in, and the plaintiff had a verdict. And Fox v. Mahoney (b) and Smith v. Woodward (a) are authorities against such a limitation. The dictum of Pat- teson J. in the latter case suggests the only safe criterion, viz., whether proof of the bankruptcy be an essential step in the plaintiff's case, that fact constituting a part of the ground of action. [Coleridge J. You say that, if there would have been a right of action in somebody at all events, the depositions are admissible.] That is the rule. [Littledale J. In acting upon such a rule you must reverse the usual course of proceedings on the trial; for, to ascertain whether the depositions are admissible or not, you must first prove the rest of the case. Coleridge J. Counsel might open a case which would make the evidence admissible; but still would not its admissibility be made to depend upon the opinion of the Jury as to the proof of those facts?] The question whether the plaintiff's case depended on the fact of bankruptcy or not, would always be a plain one, and could not require the decision of a jury. In the present case it arose upon the form of the record. The point of admissibility, however, cannot in general be determinable (as was suggested on the other side) by the form of the record. Indeed, in actions brought by assignees, the cause of action, as stated on the record, very commonly seems to be one for which the bankrupt could not have sued. [Lord Denman C. J. I was of opinion at the trial that there was no case of fraud to go to the jury. The clause is an embarrassing one. The depositions are made admissible in all actions brought by the assignees for any debt or demand for which the bankrupt might have sued. What is such a debt or demand, may depend on many circumstances. By whose opinion is the effect of those to be determined? Is the judge to decide it, or to leave it to the jury? As to the form of the record, some records can furnish no information as to the cause of action, by which this point can be determined: and others might, but do not.]

Cur. adv. vult.

KITCHENER
against
POWER.

LORD DENMAN, C. J., now delivered the judgment of the Court. After stating the facts, and the objection taken at the trial, his Lordship proceeded as follows:—

It is unnecessary to determine whether the plaintiffs would ultimately have made out a case entitling them to judgment against the defendant; for it is enough to say that they had had a right to present it to the consideration of the jury. The question, therefore, turns upon the construction of the ninety-second section of the statute 6 G. 4. c. 16.; and, as this is a point of very general application, and the authorities appeared to conflict, we thought it right to look into them before we pronounced our judgment.

The words of the section, after stating the circumstances under which it is to apply at all, are these:—“The depositions”—“shall be conclusive evidence of the matters therein respectively contained, in all actions at law or suits in equity, brought by the assignees for any debt or demand for which the bankrupt might have sustained any action or suit.” It would, perhaps, have rendered the intention of the legislature more obvious, if, immediately after the word “bankrupt,” the words “if no bankruptcy had intervened” had been inserted.

Two modes of construing the latter words of the section were suggested; the first by a strict reference to the cause of action as stated on the record, which appears to have been the principle applied by Lord Tenterden in Jones, Assignee of Wild v. Fort (a), a case recognised by him in Gibson v. Oldfield (a); and the latter by a reference to the facts of the case, as stated on the part of the assignees, which appears to have been the principle acted on in Smith, Assignee of Parker v. Woodward (b), and Fox, Assignee of Sowercropp v. Mahony (c).

The nonsuit in the present case proceeded upon the adoption of the former mode; and this has apparently the advantage of great simplicity in its application. Taking the record to state all those circumstances which are necessary conditions to the maintenance of the action, it would seem very desirable to be able to determine the admissibility of a particular mode of proof by reference to so unambiguous and fixed a criterion, especially with regard to facts usually proved in the commencement of the trial, and before the general facts of the case have been gone into.

But, upon consideration, we are of opinion that there is a fallacy in the application of this test; for, although the record must be taken to contain a statement of all circumstances formally necessary for the maintenance of the issue by the plaintiffs, the question is not, whether the same issue in form could have been sustained, merely substituting the bankrupt's name, as plaintiff, for that of his assignee, but whether the bankrupt, if no bankruptcy had occurred, could have maintained any action or suit for the recovery of the same debt or demand. A reference to the record cannot answer this latter question; a conversion, for example, must be alleged in trover, either before or after the bankruptcy, in order to found the action by the assignees; but how can a statement of the latter only in such action be taken as proof, that the former also might not have been truly stated, if, the bankrupt himself being plaintiff, it had become necessary?

(b) 4 C. & P. 541.

(c) 2 Cr. & J. 325. 2 Tyr. 285.

Further, we are of opinion that it is by adopting the latter, rather than the former rule, that we best effectuate the intention of the statute. The section in question (the ninety-second) must be looked at in connection with the ninetieth and ninety-first, ninety-third and ninety-fourth; and, taking them altogether, it is obvious that the legislature intended on the one hand to facilitate, and on the other to indemnify against, the recovery by the assignees of such debts or demands as were due to the bankrupt; to the recovery of which their title as assignees was merely a formal step against every one but himself, and in the recovery of which, therefore, the bankruptcy was an immaterial circumstance. In all such cases, neither the bankrupt nor the debtor having given any notice of disputing their title, the assignees are relieved from producing any proof in support of it, and, if such notice be given by the debtor only, are furnished with a simple and conclusive proof in the depositions taken before the commissioners. As the debtor is indemnified against the bankrupt for any payment made by him or recovery had against him under such circumstances, there is no injustice or inconvenience in these provisions. Thus, in the matter now under consideration, if there be any case at all for the plaintiffs, the defendant is certainly liable either to them or to the bankrupt; and his payment to the assignees will be protected by the ninety-fourth section, if the notice specified by the ninety-second section has not been given, even should the commission be afterwards superseded. The bankruptcy, therefore, is an immaterial fact in the cause. The same observation applies to the cases of bills not due, and of goods sold upon a credit unexpired at the date of the bankruptcy.

But there are cases, such as those of fraudulent preference, in which, unless there be a valid commission, there is no cause of action against the defendant in any one. In these, therefore, the bankruptcy is a material ingredient in the cause of action, and it would not be fitting to conclude the defendant as to that, more than as to any other part of the merits of the case, by the evidence taken by the commissioners when he was not present.

We think that this intent of the statute, and distinction in the nature of demands, would in many cases be lost sight of, if the records alone were looked to. On the other hand, the statement of the case relied on by the plaintiffs must always enable the Judge to decide within which class it falls; and no inconvenience can result from the admission of the evidence upon such statement, because, if the proof should not correspond, the plaintiffs will have made no case at all, and must be nonsuited.

We have remarked that the authorities upon this point are not uniform : — but, in the two cases earliest in point of time, the subject does not appear to have been brought fully before the mind of Lord Tenterden, and it was immaterial to reconsider his decision in either of them; as in the first the facts were adequately proved by other evidence, and the second case went off upon a reference. Of the two later cases — in Smith v. Woodward (a) the verdict passed upon the admission of the proceedings; the ruling, therefore, might have been questioned, if it had upon consideration been thought improper; and Fox v. Mahony (a) is a decision in banc by the Court of Exchequer, upon which I should have acted at Nisi Prius, if it had been then brought to my notice.

As well, therefore, upon a consideration of the words and intention of the statute, as of the weight of authority, we think that in the present case the proceedings should have been admitted, and consequently that the rule for setting aside the nonsuit should be absolute.

In the Matter of the Arbitration between ALLEN PERING, and JOHN KEYMER and ALICE his Wife.

Saturday,
May 9th.

IN Michaelmas term 1834, Follett obtained a rule nisi for setting aside the award in this case. The following facts appeared on affidavit. By an agreement, between Allen Pering of the one part, and John Keymer, and Alice his wife, of the other part, all matters in difference between the parties relating to certain property at Norwood were referred to the award of William Stevens and John Vincent, and, in case they should not agree, then to the award of Stevens and Vincent, and such person as they (before entering on the subject of the reference) should appoint, or any two of them. Mr. Stevens had been named by Pering, and Mr. Vincent by Keymer and his wife. Stevens and Vincent afterwards, and before entering upon the reference, named a barrister as umpire. Stevens and Vincent not agreeing, the three proceeded with the reference. After the case had been heard, at a meeting of the three arbitrators, the umpire stated the terms of a proposed award, to which Stevens objected, as not being sufficiently in Pering's favour. The matter was discussed at some length, and the meeting terminated by Stevens saying to the umpire, "If I cannot alter the impression on your mind, I must leave you and Mr. Vincent to draw up the award as you like; I shall not join in it." The three did not meet again. Afterwards, by a mistake of Vincent's clerk, a draft of a proposed award, made by Vincent at an

A dispute was referred to the decision of three arbitrators, or any two of them. A proposed award was shewn at a meeting of the three, to which one of them objected, and he, after a discussion, declared that, if the other two would not alter their view, they must make the award by themselves, and he would not join in it.

Afterwards a draft, different from that of the proposed award, was sent by mistake to the last-mentioned arbitrator, by the other two; and he returned it with comments and objections. The two others subsequently made an award corresponding with that originally proposed, without again submitting it to the third arbitrator. The Court set the award aside.

earlier stage of the case, was sent to Stevens, who, conceiving it to be a draft of an award then proposed to be made, sent it to the umpire with remarks and objections. After this, and without any further communication with Stevens, the two other arbitrators executed an award which, as they now swore, was, in substance and fact, the same as that proposed at the last meeting of the three arbitrators.

The rule nisi specified, as an objection to the award, that it had been made by one of the arbitrators and the umpire without any consultation with, or intimation given to the other arbitrator.

Wightman now shewed cause. Any two of the three arbitrators had power to make the award. It is true that they could not do so without consulting the other. But it appears that they had discussed the case with him, and he had told them that, if they did not change their opinion, they must make the award by themselves, and that he would not join. And his objections were never withdrawn. After this, there was no use in applying to him again: his refusal to join in the award could not be more peremptory.

Sir F. Pollock and Sir W. W. Follett, contra, were stopped by the Court.

LORD DENMAN C. J. This award was not properly made. Any two, under such a submission as this, may make a good award; but then it must be after discussion with the other arbitrator. If, after discussion, it appears that there is no chance of agreement with one of the arbitrators, the others may indeed proceed with out him. Here, Stevens, the arbitrator appointed by Pering, always took a view more favourable to Pering than the other arbitrators; and, on one occasion, he said that he would have no more to do with the matter. Had that declaration been acted on, I do not say that the award would not have been valid. But afterwards a memorandum of award finds its way, somehow or other, into the hands of Stevens. He gives his opinion upon that, and writes his objections. Then the other two, without meeting him, or considering how far their view may be varied by his objections, execute an award, as unfavourable as before to Pering. Stevens's objections might be insufficient; but the others were at least bound to hear what he had to say in support of them. It was only upon full notice given to him, that they were entitled to proceed without him.

LITLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion; though, probably, if the arbitrators and umpire had proceeded regularly, the same award would have been made.

PATTESON J. I am of the same opinion. The two who made the award did not treat Stevens's refusal at the last meeting as final.

COLERIDGE J. The parties have not got what they stipulated for. They stipulated that two at least should make the award; but no two could make it till each arbitrator had been consulted. One of them refused his assent. I do not say that this might not have authorised the others to proceed without him; but they got into communication with him again, and he sent them his objections. Now they either did or did not take those objections into their consideration. If they

SOADY against WILSON.

Under the statutes of sewers, every person, whose property derives benefit from the works of the Commissioners, is liable to be rated, although the benefit be not immediate.

Thus, where a case stated that the eastern wing of Somerset House was drained by the Board of Works, and had no communication with the common sewer running under the body of Somerset House, and being under the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, and that the buildings derived no benefit from that sewer, except the general advantage of being accessible, and of the approaches and neighbouring public ways being properly drained and cleansed: it was held that the occupiers of the eastern wing were rateable for the common sewer.

Seemable, that in an action of trespass against the commissioners for levying a rate, if it appeared that they had jurisdiction, the Court would not inquire whether the rate was proportioned to the benefit received from the sewage by the party rated.

Under the Sewers' Act, 52 G. 3. c. xlviii. (local and personal, public) s. 7., the party rated to the poor as the occupier of premises, is to be considered as the occupier for the purpose of assessment to the sewers' rate, although, in point of fact, the occupancy is questioned.

THIS was an action of trespass, brought by the clerk of the minutes to the Commissioners for Auditing the Public Accounts, against a bailiff to the Commissioners of Sewers for the city and liberty of Westminster and part of Middlesex, for taking and distraining a table. A case was stated for the opinion of this Court (pursuant to stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 25.), to the following effect: —

The office of the Commissioners for Auditing Public Accounts is situated in the east wing of Somerset House, which is in the parish of St. Mary-le-Strand, in the city and liberty of Westminster, and in the district of the eastern division of the Westminster sewers. By stat. 15 G. 3. c. 33. s. 16., his Majesty's palace, called Somerset House, with all its rights, members, &c. was declared to be vested in his Majesty, his heirs, and successors, freed from all incumbrances whatsoever, for the use, intent, and purpose of erecting and establishing within the same (amongst other public offices in the said act enumerated) the Auditors of the Imprests Office. By stat. 25 G. 3. c. 52. the last-mentioned office was determined, and the office of Commissioners for Auditing the Public Accounts established in its place. The plaintiff is the principal clerk to the commissioners in that office.

Neither the Commissioners for Auditing the Public Accounts, nor the plaintiff, reside in the office appropriated to the service of auditing the public accounts, nor is there any room or place in the said office fitted up for the purpose of residence. The attendance of the commissioners and of the plaintiff at such office is only from ten o'clock in the morning to four in the afternoon, for the purpose of discharging the duties of their respective offices. The persons, who sleep on the premises appropriated to the office of the said commissioners, are the office-keeper, and one of the messengers attached to the said office, who inhabit three sitting-rooms, five bedrooms, two kitchens, &c. The commissioners, the plaintiff, and the messenger are paid by salaries, but no deduction is made from the salary of the commissioners or the plaintiff for the use made by them of the office, nor from the messenger's salary in respect of his sleeping therein.

The statute of sewers, 23 H. 8. c. 5. s. 3. (a), authorises the Commissioners to distrain; and s. 9. enacts that the same laws, ordinances, &c., to be made by the Commissioners, "shall bind as well the lands, tenements, and hereditaments of the King our sovereign lord, as all and every other person and persons, and their heirs, for such their interest as they shall fortune to have, or may have, in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or other casual profit, advantage, or commodity, whatsoever they be, whereunto the said laws, ordinances, and decrees shall in anywise extend according to the true purport, meaning, and intent of the same laws." The stat. 3 & 4 Ed. 6. c. 8. s. 1. continues the preceding statute; and s. 2. gives authority to levy all sewer-rates assessed upon the lands, &c. of the King, by distress or otherwise, in like manner as may be done in the lands, &c. of any other person; and enacts that bills of acquittance, signed by the collector to the Commissioners, shall be a discharge to the tenants, farmers, and occupiers of such grounds, for the sums assessed.

Under Somerset House there are drains and sewers originally made by the authority of his Majesty's Board of Works and at the public expense, which drains and sewers are still under the management and control of the said board, and are cleansed, repaired, and maintained at the public expense. The drains and sewers under the east wing of Somerset House communicate with the above drains and sewers, and form part thereof, and are west of the city of London, and fall into the river Thames.

The statute 3 Ja. 1. c. 14., after a recital (which was set out in the case), enacts, by s. 2., "that the walls, ditches, banks, gutters, sewers, gates, cawseys, bridges, streams and watercourses, within the limits of two miles of and from the city of London, which waters have their course, and fall into the river of Thames, shall from henceforth be to all intents, constructions and purposes, as fully subject to the commission of sewers, and to all the statutes made for sewers, and to all penalties in the same statutes and in every of them contained, as if the same places near to the said city of London had been particularly named in the said statute of sewers, or that therein therein the water had ebbed and flowed, and therein free passage with boats and barges to the sea had been heretofore used ; any thing in the said statutes, or elsewhere, to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding."

The case next set out stat. 2 W. & M. sess. 2. c. 8. s. 14., which, after reciting that many new sewers have been made in Westminster by the Commissioners under an act (13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 2.) since expired, and are now neglected from a doubt as to jurisdiction, enacts that all new sewers made since 12 Car. 2., shall be subject to the commission of sewers, and to the statutes of sewers, as if mentioned therein.

By stat. 47 G. 3. sess. 1. c. vii. (local and personal, public) s. 1., after reciting the above-mentioned acts of 3 Ja. 1. and 2 W. & M., and also reciting certain inconveniencies (a), it is enacted, "that all the walls, ditches, banks, gutters, sewers, gotes, causeys, bridges, streams, and watercourses west of the city of London, extending to and including a certain watercourse, part of which

(a) This recital, (set out in the case,) is as follows : — "Whereas many persons who reside at a greater distance than two miles from the city of London, have the convenience of carrying off the waters from their lands and houses by means of divers communications with the great sewers under the management of the commissioners for the city and liberty of Westminster, and part of the county of Middlesex : and whereas those communications with the great sewers as aforesaid have caused great expence to the said commissioners, and considerable hurt, damage, and inconvenience to divers of his Majesty's subjects, from the additional quantity of water which passes through them to the aforesaid sewers, occasioned by the increase of buildings out of the said limits : and whereas divers sewers, streams, drains, and water courses which are situate or may be made beyond the limits prescribed by the said recited acts respectively, may require to be surveyed, corrected, and amended by the said commissioners, and doubts having arisen whether the sewers, streams, drains, and water courses before mentioned, are under the survey, correction, and amendment of the said commissioners for the city and liberty," &c. There is a common sewer running through the square at Somerset House, running under Somerset House, which was made and is cleansed, repaired, and maintained, by the commissioners of sewers for the city and liberty of Westminster; but the drains and sewers under the eastern wing aforesaid do not communicate therewith; nor do any of the drains and sewers stated above to have been made and to be cleansed, repaired, and maintained by, and to be under the management of his Majesty's Board of Works: so that the buildings of Somerset House derive no immediate benefit from the said drain or sewer of the Commissioners of Sewers, except the general benefit and advantage of being accessible, and of its approaches and neighbouring public ways being properly drained and cleansed.

The

The office of the Commissioners for Auditing Public Accounts has not heretofore been rated to any sewers' rates, nor has any person, until the rate after mentioned, been rated in respect thereof. The assessment in question was entered in the commissioners' rate books as follows:—

By stat. 52 G. 3. c. xlviii. (local and personal, public) s. 7., after reciting that difficulty had arisen to the commissioners of sewers in laying an equal rate, by reason of their not being authorised to call for and inspect the poors' rates of the parishes within their jurisdiction, they are empowered to order their clerk, or other person on their behalf, to inspect and take a copy of the last poors' rate in any parish within their jurisdiction; and the vestry clerk, or other person having the custody of such rate, is required, under the regulations laid down in that clause (which was set out in the case), to produce such rate and allow a copy to be taken, or furnish a copy, “in order to enable the said commissioners of sewers to lay an equal rate or assessment on the several inhabitants within the limits of the said commissions, or any portion thereof.”

The commissioners of sewers, by virtue of the last-mentioned act, inspected the rate-books of the said parish of St. Mary-le-Strand, and the plaintiff is therein rated for the relief of the poor of that parish in respect of the said premises, at the yearly rental before-mentioned. Payment of the rate was duly demanded, and refused; and thereupon the commissioners of sewers made a warrant according to stat. 7 Ann c. 10. s. 3., which empowers the commissioners by their warrant to give authority for levying the sums to be assessed upon the lands, &c., "liable or chargeable with any sasses, taxes, impositions, or charges, by authority of their said commission, by distress and sale of the goods of such person or persons that shall not pay, or refuse to pay." By the said warrant the defendant was authorised and required to levy by distress and sale of the goods of the several persons mentioned in a certain schedule annexed thereto, or of any other occupiers of the premises mentioned in the said schedule opposite to their respective names, the respective sums placed against their names in the said schedule, being so much taxed or assessed upon the said premises for and towards the cleansing, repairing, and maintaining of certain common sewers within the district called the eastern division of the Westminster sewers. The defendant made the levy upon the plaintiff, which was the trespass now alleged.

If the Court should be of opinion that the office of the Commissioners for Auditing Public Accounts was liable to the sewers' rate, and that the commissioners, or the plaintiff, were liable to be assessed thereto as the occupiers or occupier of the said office, judgment was to be entered for the defendant; if the Court should be of a contrary opinion, judgment to be entered for the plaintiff. The questions stated in the margin of the case were, — 1st. Whether, upon the construction of the several sections of acts set out in the case, the office of the Commissioners for Auditing the Public Accounts is liable to be rated at all for sewage rates. 2dly. If the office be liable, whether the plaintiff, according to the the facts stated, is liable to be rated in respect of his occupation of the said office. This case was argued in last Hilary term (a).

Rogers, for the plaintiff. It is not denied that the premises on which the distress was taken are within the ambit of the jurisdiction given to the commissioners of sewers by the statutes referred to in the case. The principal question is, Whether the Commissioners for Auditing Public Accounts, derive any benefit, as to the office used by them, from the works of the commissioners of sewers, which benefit can be made the ground of an assessment. That to warrant such a tax there must be a benefit received by the party charged, is shewn by the Case of the Isle of Ely (b), and may be collected from Keighley's Case (c) and Rooke's Case (d). The principle appears to be also recognised in Callis on Sewers, pp. 120, 121., and 124. and elsewhere. It is also adopted in several modern cases. In Dore v. Gray (e) Buller J. says, "It is objected, Where will the jurisdiction of the commissioners stop in such cases? The line may be drawn from this case, where it is stated that the party, over whose land the work is done, is, or is likely to be, benefited by it: if he be so, that is sufficient to give them jurisdiction." In Masters v. Scroggs (g) the Court of King's Bench expressed the same opinion. There the house assessed was within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of Sewers, and therefore prima facie rateable; but it was argued, and with success, that the plaintiff's house was much above the level of the great northern sewer, and could not have been injured if that sewer had been obstructed, nor did it receive any additional benefit from the covering of the watercourse mentioned in the case, communicating with that sewer. In the present case, the sewage in question does not even communicate with the works under the management of the commissioners of sewers: it receives no immediate or definite advantage from them. In Stafford v. Hamston (a) Dallas C. J. says, "The commissioners are only to assess those, who receive, or who are likely to reap profit, or who have, or may have hurt, loss, or disadvantage;" and he comments on the previous cases, recognising the law laid down in them. The same principle was acted upon in Netherton v. Ward (b) and Rex v. The Commissioners of Sewers for the Tower Hamlets (c). In the first of these two cases, it was stated that the dock yard, in which the assessed premises stood, was "principally" drained by sewers made and maintained at the expense of the Crown, but derived a benefit from the public sewers also. Here the eastern wing of Somerset House is entirely drained by the Board of Works, and its sewers have no communication with the public sewer. It is not contended, on the other side, that this charge can be imposed unless some benefit be derived from the sewer. Then the question will be, What kind of benefit is sufficient? To ascertain what benefit is received, it may be asked, whether the party to be charged makes any use of the sewer. In the case of an embankment, the question would be, whether damage would result to him from its being removed, as in Rooke's case (d); with respect to an inland drainage the question is, whether any immediate advantage is derived from it to those lands for which the party is charged, the direct object and intention of the sewage being to drain the land and relieve it from water. Now here no immediate benefit arises in respect of the land in question ; but the neighbouring land receives some benefit from which this property indirectly derives advantage. If that is a ground of charge, there are two things for which the rate is imposed — the direct benefit, and the indirect, which last is merely of the same nature as that received by all the King's subjects passing along the Strand. The persons using Somerset House enjoy it in a greater degree ; but the advantage is of the same kind ; and it is not one in respect of which parties can properly be rated. The statute 23 H. 8. c. 5. s. 3. (a) directs the commissioners of sewers to assess persons for the purposes of the act,

(a) Stat. 23 H. 8. c. 5. ss. 2, 3, 4., sets out the commission of sewers, by which (sect. 3.), the commissioners are directed to survey the sewers, &c., to cause the same to be amended, &c. after their discretions, and to ordain therein after the form of the statutes and ordinances made, &c. touching the premises ; " as also to inquire by the oaths of the honest and lawful men," &c., " through whose default the said hurts and damages have happened, and who hath or holdeth any lands or tenements, or common of pasture, or profit of fishing, or hath or may have any hurt, loss, or disadvantage by any manner of means in the said places, as well near to the said dangers, lets, and impediments, as inhabiting or dwelling thereabouts, by the said walls, ditches, banks, gutters, gotes, sewers, trenches, and other the said impediments and annoyances ; and all those persons, and every of them, to tax, assess, charge, distrain, and punish, as well within the metes, limits, and bounds of old time accustomed, or otherwise, or elsewhere within our realm of England, after the quantity of their lands, tenements, and rents, by the number of acres and perches, after the rate of every person's portion, tenure, or profit, or after the quantity of their common of pasture, or profit of fishing, or other commodities there, by such ways and means, and in such manner," as to the commissioners, or six of them, shall seem most convenient.

“after the quantity of their lands,” which must mean the quantity of the lands benefited; but this could not be estimated with reference to such an indirect benefit as is received in the present instance. This is like the case of an individual choosing to drain his own land; he ought to be exempt from charge, and not to be rated for some benefit which he may derive from the draining of adjacent land by others. Perhaps the commissioners, if they had not confidence in such an individual, might insist upon taking the drainage into their own hands; but here that has not been done. Suppose the level of the ground were such that it required no sewage, must the proprietors be rated because the neighbouring soil is rendered more healthy by draining? The rule must be, that the benefit, forming the consideration for the rate, shall accrue in respect of the thing which is the subject of assessment. Besides, the advantage received by the occupiers of these premises from the sufficiency of the drainage, is not derived by them from the commissioners of sewers: it is the business of the commissioners, of pavements, or other parish officers, to cleanse and purify the approaches, and it is to them the occupiers look for that accommodation: if the performance of that work is rendered easier by the drainage, the benefit is not one which the occupiers can be said to derive immediately from the commissioners of sewers. These commissioners are paid for the direct benefit by those who reap it, and are not to be paid again by those who profit by their works indirectly. [Williams J. Do you make any distinction, as to this point, between premises occupied as Somerset House is, and those of a private person?] None is intended:

intended: all the cases which have been cited on the subject of benefit derived (except Netherton v. Ward (a)) relate to premises of the latter kind.

A further question is, whether there be an occupation of these premises, in respect of which any person can be rated. The assessment to the poor-rate proves nothing; and it is not even stated that the rate has ever been paid. The case, as to the occupation, is like Holford v. Copeland (b), where the Masters in Chancery were held not liable to paying rate as occupiers of the premises used by them as offices; and the authorities on the subject were there fully cited. If there is no occupier in the present case, the King, as owner, may be rated under stat. 23 H. 8. c. 5. s. 9., and the rate levied, if necessary, by distress, under stat. 3 & 4 Ed. 6. c. 8. s. 1. Here the charge has been laid upon persons having no relation to the estate, either as owners or their representatives, as tenants, or as occupiers: they are merely persons frequenting an office. The messenger is not the servant of the Commissioners of the Audit Office, but of the Crown; and, if this were otherwise, his occupation would take its character from that of the commissioners, and would furnish no additional ground for holding them liable.

Blackburne contra. The facts of the case sufficiently shew that the plaintiff is an occupier. Netherton v. Ward (a) decides that, where premises belonging to the Crown are the subject of sewers' rate, a person occupying them, though not paying rent, is liable; and then, by stat. 52 G. 3. c. xlviii. s. 7., it is to be ascertained from the poor's rate who are liable to be assessed as so occupying.

[Littledale J. The poor's rate is to be looked at to ascertain the proportion of assessment, but it does not follow that that reference should have the effect of introducing any new person as subject to the rate.] The land being liable to rate, the goods were liable by being found upon it. Saffery v. Elgood (a) shews this; for the sewers' rate is a charge upon the land, and, so far, in the nature of a rent-charge. But the real question is (and it is one rather of fact than of law,) whether the east wing of Somerset House derives, or is likely to derive, a benefit from the works of the Commissioners of sewers. It is certainly not sufficient to shew that the premises charged are within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of sewers; this is established by Masters v. Scroggs (b), and Stafford v. Hamston (c): it must appear, as the Court said in the former case, that the party receives, or is likely to receive, a benefit. But, as to the case put on the other side, of premises in an elevated situation and requiring no drainage, why should the occupier of such premises be exempt from rate, if by means of the drainage he is enabled the better to come at his land, and to make it beneficial? It has been suggested that the Commissioners of sewers may be twice paid, as if this were the case of men executing a work and deriving a profit from it; but the Commissioners are only persons laying out public money for public works; the question is, whether the east wing of Somerset House, receiving a benefit from those works, shall pay for such benefit: if that part of Somerset House be rated for the benefit so derived, some other place will be rated less. The Court cannot enter into the question how much or how little advantage is received, if the place rated receives any. Nor does it matter whether the benefit be direct or indirect, nor whether it arise from draining the place itself, or from draining the adjacent land, and making the whole more accessible. The plaintiff is not assessed as a person walking along the Strand, but as one occupying land which gains an advantage from the sewers. And that an advantage does accrue, is admitted by the case itself; for it states, "that the buildings of Somerset House derive no immediate benefit from the said drain or sewer," — "except the general benefit and advantage of being accessible, and of its approaches and neighbouring public ways being properly drained and cleansed." Besides, if there were not a great sewer under Somerset House, like that described in the case, the water which runs through that sewer would go into the drains under the east wing. [Littledale J. The plaintiff means that the sewage under the east wing is sufficient for the buildings there, and that they do not want the benefit of the great sewer.]

(b) 3 M. & S. 447.

(c) 2 B. & B. 691.

Rogers, in reply. In Netherton v. Ward (a) an occupation in fact was expressly stated in the case, and was particularly relied upon by Holroyd J. in giving judgment. The object of stat. 52 G. 3. c. xlviii. is the ascertaining, not who are to be considered occupiers, but in what proportions they shall be rated. It is said that the distress was at all events legal, because the goods were found upon the land charged; but, assuming the fact to be so, which is not stated, the question submitted to the Court in this case is, not whether the distress would be legal if the assessment were good, but whether the assessment was laid on the right person. And it is not correct to say that the charge is laid upon the land; by the statute of sewers it is imposed on the person in respect of the land. The case expressly finds that no immediate benefit is derived from the great sewer to the building in question. If the charge is to be in proportion to the advantage received, it is impossible to fix any proportion in which the charge should be assessed for the indirect and indefinite advantage here insisted upon.

Cur. adv. vult.

This was an action of trespass, for the purpose of trying the validity of a sewers' rate imposed on the plaintiff as occupier of the Audit Office, in the eastern wing of Somerset House. The plaintiff contended that such rate was improperly imposed on him as the occupier, even if it could be imposed at all in respect of that building: but that also he denied.

A case was agreed upon, stating the particulars from which the plaintiff's occupation was inferred by the defendant: on the effect of them we do not find it necessary to give any opinion, because the 52 G. 3. c. xlviii. gives the power to rate those persons as occupiers who are de facto assessed to the poor's rate, and the plaintiff, filling the latter character with respect to the premises, is clothed with the former by the statute referred to. We are, therefore, to decide whether the occupier of the Audit Office is liable to be rated to the sewers in respect of that occupation.

The

The facts on this point were these: that under Somerset House there are drains and sewers originally made by and still under the management and control of the Board of Works, at the public expense; that the drains and sewers under the eastern wing communicate with these and form part thereof; that they are west of London, and fall into the Thames: that there is a common sewer running through the square of Somerset House and under Somerset House, which was made and is repaired by the commissioners of sewers for Westminster, but the drains and sewers under the eastern wing do not communicate therewith, nor do the buildings of Somerset House derive any immediate benefit therefrom, except the general benefit and advantage of being accessible, and of its approaches and neighbouring public ways being properly drained and cleansed.

Though numerous cases were cited in the argument, from Keighley's Case (a), to Rez v. The Commissioners of Sewers for the Tower Hamlets (b), the doctrine laid down in them all is uniform and undisputed, as applicable to the present question. It rests on the principle, that every one whose property derives benefit from the works of the Commissioners may be assessed to the rates they impose. The benefit is not required to be immediate, nor do the cases, or the commission itself, or the statutes, say any thing of the nature or amount of the benefit. Possibly that benefit may be so extremely small, that a jury would not have found the fact stated in the case. But, on the other hand, the kind of benefit may be of high value, as if a house were inaccessible, because surrounded by marshes, and the works of sewage had made them hard and passable. The case does not even state that the amount of rate does not bear a just proportion to the extent of benefit. This may possibly be immaterial: for, if the commissioners have jurisdiction, this Court would not inquire whether they had correctly exercised their judgment, in an action of trespass for levying the rate. But as the jurisdiction results from the fact of benefit being derived, and the case expressly states that some benefit was derived, we think ourselves bound by the finding to say that the defendant had authority to levy the rate, and is consequently entitled to our judgment.

DOE on the several Demises of JOSEPH LANE Monday, May 11th.
 LUCAS SHELTON, THOMAS WOOD ROBERTS, and THOMAS WOOD ROBERTS, WILLIAM ROBERTS, and JOHN ROBERTS, against BROWN SHELTON.

ON the trial of this ejectment, at the Herefordshire Summer assizes, 1833, before Tindal C. J., the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of this Court on the following case:—

The 1. A verdict was taken for plaintiff in ejectment, subject to a special case, which stated that it was "the custom in the manor" in which the premises in question, being copyhold lands, were, that where a copyholder, being a feme covert, surrendered, if the husband consented to the surrender, such consent should be expressed in the surrender and admission; and that without his consent the surrender was inoperative. Quære, whether upon this it must be understood that, if the husband were shewn to have consented in fact, but such consent was not expressed in the surrender, the surrender was inoperative.

2. The custom so understood would not be bad in law.

3. The Court refused to amend the case, at the instance of plaintiff alone, by the Judge's notes, so as to limit it to a mere statement that the common practice was to enter the consent in the surrender and admission.

4. Supposing such an entry not indispensable, the Court, upon a case stated, will not, in default of evidence, assume the fact of the consent, in order to prevent the surrender from being invalidated, as against a party disputing the efficacy of the surrender and claiming as heir to the wife.

5. Nor will the Court so assume, upon proof that the husband had joined in a previous surrender of the copyholds to the use of a stranger for the wife's life, and was not entitled to curtesy, that he was present in the court at which the surrender in question took place; that the entry of the surrender in the court-roll was incomplete, but contained no entry of the consent; and that the surrenderee was admitted, but did not take possession.

6. And semble, that a jury ought not so to assume, on these facts alone.

7. The objection to the want of consent, or to its not being expressed in the surrender and admission, may be taken by a party claiming as heir to the wife.

8. The statement, in the case, of the necessity of the husband's consent, cannot be understood to apply to cases only where he has an interest at the time of the surrender.

9. A surrender expressed that S. "came by W. H. and R. J. his assignees duly appointed." Held to be no proof, against a party disputing the surrender, that S. had been a bankrupt, nor of W. H. and R. J. having been authorised by him to appear.

10. A surrender so expressed does not satisfy a custom, that a surrender may be made by attorney duly appointed, and that, when a surrender is so made, it is to be mentioned in the surrender that it was made by attorney duly appointed.

11. By a deed of January 1796, reciting S.'s bankruptcy, and the conveyance under it of land, belonging to S., to T. W., T. W. conveyed to B. for the purpose of making a tenant to the præcipe. B. was no party to this deed; but he, in February 1796, by deed not referring expressly to the bankruptcy or the previous deed, conveyed the lands to a tenant to the præcipe, and declared the uses of the recovery to be to his mother for life, remainder to himself in fee: the parties to the intended recovery, named in this deed, were the same as those mentioned in the preceding: Held, that B., in a suit respecting other land, was not estopped from disputing S.'s bankruptcy.

12. If the husband of a woman who, in 1796, has a reversionary estate tail in copyhold lands in which there is no curtesy, be proved to have been a bankrupt in 1796, and the wife's estate tail afterwards vest in possession, and she surrender it in 1803, this is not prima facie proof, as against the son of the two, claiming under the entail, that the husband had no interest at the time of the surrender.

13. Semble, that it would be such prima facie proof as against the husband.

The premises in question are copyhold of inheritance of the manor of Bromyard and Bromyard Foreign, in the county of Hereford. On the 11th of April 1749, Anthony Kerry, being seized of the premises in fee, according to the custom of the said manor, duly surrendered them to the use of the said Anthony Kerry, James Lane, and Elizabeth his wife (the daughter of the said Anthony Kerry), successively, and after their deceases to the heir or heirs of the body of the said Elizabeth by James, remainder over. Anthony Kerry was, on the same day, duly admitted tenant of the same premises. Elizabeth, the wife of the said James Lane, died in 1759, leaving issue by the said James Lane two daughters, Mary and Elizabeth. By the custom of the manor there is no coparcenary, but the eldest daughter is the sole heir: and, therefore, on the death of Elizabeth the mother in 1759, the estate tail vested in Mary the eldest daughter. She survived Anthony Kerry, who died in 1770, and also James Lane, who died in January 1803. In 1769, Mary Lane was married to Brown Shelton the elder, by whom she had issue four children; Brown Shelton the younger, the defendant; James Lane Shelton, the second son; a daughter named Mary Maria; and Joseph Shelton, the youngest son, who was the father of Joseph Lane Lucas Shelton, one of the lessors of the plaintiff.

The lessors of the plaintiff put in a deed of January 26th, 1796, purporting to be between Thomas Wood, of the first part; Richard Jones, of the second part; James Lane, of the third part; Mary, the wife of Brown Shelton the elder, of the fourth part; William Hyde, of the fifth part; and Brown Shelton, the younger, of the sixth part: whereby it was recited that, by a settlement settlement in 1773, made soon after the marriage of Brown Shelton the elder and Mary his wife, and also under and by virtue of divers proceedings, conveyances, and assurances in the law, had, made, done, and executed by virtue of and under a commission of bankrupt bearing date the 8th of January 1781, awarded and issued against the said Brown Shelton the elder, by the description, &c., a certain estate at Eastham had been conveyed to the said Thomas Wood and to Benjamin Taylor, deceased, and their heirs, during the life of Brown Shelton the elder, in trust, for the sole and separate use of Mary the wife of the said Brown Shelton, for her life, remainder to the said Mary for her life, remainder to their issue in tail male, with divers remainders over. And, after further reciting that it was intended that a common recovery should be suffered, wherein the said James Lane should be demandant, and Richard Barneby should be tenant, and Brown Shelton the younger should be vouchee, the indenture then conveyed the said freehold premises to Brown Shelton the younger, for the purpose of vesting the freehold in him, so as to enable him to convey the same to Barneby, in order to make him a good tenant to the præcipe. This deed was executed by all the above-mentioned parties, except Brown Shelton the younger.

By an indenture of release, dated the 9th February 1796, between Brown Shelton the younger, of the first part; Richard Barneby, of the second part; James Lane, of the third part; Mary, wife of Brown Shelton the elder, of the fourth part; and Richard Jones, of the fifth part; it was witnessed that, for barring of all estates tail and remainders over in the hereditaments therein granted, the said Brown Shelton conveyed the said premises at Eastham unto Richard Barneby, with the intent to make him a good tenant of the freehold, in order for suffering a common recovery; and by the said deed it was declared, that James Lane should be demandant, Richard Barneby, tenant, and Brown Shelton the younger, vouchee. The uses of the said recovery were declared to be for the sole and separate use of Mary, the wife of Brown Shelton the elder, for her life, with remainder to Brown Shelton the younger, in fee. This deed was executed by the defendant and Richard Barneby only.

These deeds were offered in evidence to prove that an estate at Eastham had been settled upon the issue of the marriage, and also that Brown Shelton the elder was declared a bankrupt in January 1781: but their admissibility was disputed on the part of the defendant, and the Chief Justice received them in evidence, subject to the opinion of this Court.

The lessors of the plaintiff put in a copy of court roll, dated 22d April 1782, stating that "at that court came Brown Shelton, by William Hyde and Richard Jones, his assignees, duly appointed, and Mary, wife of the said Brown Shelton, customary tenants of the said manor (the said Mary having been first privately examined apart from her said husband by the steward, and freely consenting), and surrendered into the hands of the lord of the said manor, according to the custom of the said manor," the premises in question, expectant on the death of James Lane (who was stated to have a life interest in the said premises), to the use and behoof of Thomas Wood, and his heir or heirs, during the joint lives of the said Brown Shelton, and Mary his wife, which said Mary was stated therein to have a life interest interest in the premises if she survived the said James Lane: and the said Thomas Wood was admitted at the same court tenant under the surrender for the joint lives of Brown Shelton and his wife, expectant upon the death of the said James Lane.

It is the custom in the said manor, if the husband consents to a surrender, that such consent shall be expressed in the surrender and admission, and without his consent the surrender is wholly inoperative. And, by the said custom, the husband takes no interest after his wife's decease, as tenant by the curtesy. By the custom of the manor a surrender may be made by attorney duly appointed; but, when it is so made, it is always mentioned in the surrender that it was made by the attorney duly appointed.

By indenture of release of 14th August 1783, the release made between James Lane, the father of Mary Shelton, Brown Shelton's wife, Thomas Wood, of Collington, and Richard Jones and William Hyde, the said James Lane conveyed certain freehold estates to the said Richard Jones and William Hyde, in trust for himself during his life; and on his decease to pay to the said Mary, or permit her to receive, the rents and profits to her separate use for life; and, by the same indenture, after reciting that a commission of bankrupt had issued against Brown Shelton, and that his assignees had put up for sale by auction his copyhold premises, and that the said Thomas Wood had been the highest bidder thereat for the same, and was declared the purchaser, but had purchased the same with the money of James Lane, and in trust for him, the said Thomas Wood covenanted to stand seized of the said copyhold premises, after the decease of the said James Lane, during the joint lives of the said Brown Shelton the elder, and Mary his wife, upon trust to pay to the said Mary, or permit her and her assigns (the same to be at her election) to receive, all the clear yearly rents, issues, and profits thereafter to arise or become payable for or in respect thereof, for her sole and separate use, to the intent that the same might be subject to her own sole disposal, independent of the said Brown Shelton the elder, her said husband, in like manner as was thereinbefore declared touching the annual rents and profits of the said freehold premises. Brown Shelton, the father, was not, neither was the defendant, a party to the last deed.

By the custom of this manor, a tenant in tail may bar the entail by surrender only, without fine or recovery; and James Lane, the surviving tenant for life under the surrender of 1749, having died in January 1803, Mary Shelton, together with the said Thomas Wood, attended at a court held on the 3d of May 1803. The lessors of the plaintiff put in an alleged copy of the court-roll, part of which was in the hand-writing of William Griffiths, the then steward, and was also signed by him, whereby it was stated as follows:—

“ At a Court Baron of Folliott, by divine permission, Lord Bishop of Hereford, there held the third day of May, in the year of our Lord 1803, before William Griffiths, gentleman, steward there :

“ At this court came Mary Shelton, the wife of Brown Shelton, and Thomas Wood, two of the customary tenants of the said manor (the said Mary having been privately examined by the steward aforesaid, and freely consenting), and surrendered into the hands of the lord of the said manor, by the hands and acceptance of the said steward, according to the custom of the said manor, two messuages," &c. (setting out the premises) "lying in the village of Norton, within the manor aforesaid, and all their and each of their estate, right, and interest therein, to the use of the said Thomas Wood, his heir or heirs for ever, according to the custom of the said manor, by the rent, heriot, and all other services therefore due and of right accustomed; but upon the trusts and for the purposes following" (setting out the trusts). "And the said Thomas Wood, being present in court, prayed to be admitted to all and singular the said premises so surrendered to his use as aforesaid, upon and subject to the trusts hereinbefore declared with respect to the same; to whom the lord of the said manor, by his said steward, granted the same messuages," &c. accordingly, habendum to the said Thomas Wood, his heir or heirs for ever, under and subject to the trusts aforesaid, by the rent, &c.; "and he gives to the lord for a fine 5*l.* 5*s.*, and is admitted tenant thereof, and had seizin by the rod, and his fealty is respited.

"William Griffiths, steward."

The court at which such surrender and admission were made, was held at some inn at Bromyard. It was a general and not a special court; it lasted many hours, and a great number of persons attended it; sometimes the rooms were quite full. The jury said that Brown Shelton the elder was present at that court. The original court roll was produced, which contains the following entry, and no other, applicable to the last-mentioned surrender:—"At this court came Mary Shelton, the wife of Brown Shelton." There is annexed to that entry entry the following, which was not made at the time, but after the year 1825. "See minute book proceedings of a court held for this manor not entered on the roll." The minute book of the steward, with reference to the proceedings at the court held on the 3d of May 1803, contained the following entry:—

 "Manor of Bromyard and Bromyard Foreign. At a court there held the 2d of May 1803, before William Griffiths, steward" (then follow the names of the jury and the homage). "At this court came Mary Shelton, wife of Brown Shelton, the said Mary having been first privately examined by the steward aforesaid, and freely consenting; and Thomas Wood, customary tenants of this manor; and surrendered all those two messuages as in Price's draft, surrender," &c.

In the margin of the same book was an entry of the steward's charges (set out in the case), including a private examination (a).

Thomas Wood was admitted tenant of the premises in fee the same day, and has since died, leaving Thomas Wood Roberts, one of the lessors of the plaintiff, his heir at law. Mary Shelton had lived separate from her husband many years before the death of James Lane,

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, first, whether the deeds of the 26th of January 1796, and the 9th of February 1796, were admissible to prove the bankruptcy of Brown Shelton the elder, and the settlement of the Eastham estate: and, secondly, whether the lessors of the plaintiff were entitled to recover upon the facts of the case. The case was argued in Hilary term last (January 20th) (a).

Sir W. W. Follett, Solicitor-General, for the plaintiff. The husband, by his assignees, was a party to the surrender of 1782, and there is presumptive proof of his consent to that of 1803. Neither the custom, nor the ordinary copyhold law, requires that he should personally be a party to the surrender, so that he consents. [Lord Denman C. J. But it is found that his consent must be expressed in the surrender and admission.] The "custom in the manor" is that it should be so expressed; but that does not mean that such is the "custom of the manor;" it means only that this is usual. If the expression, as it now stands, necessarily import the custom of the manor, the case should be amended by the Judge's notes. The plaintiff is in possession of the verdict, subject to the case. A special case, as was said by Abbott C. J. in Van Wart v. Wolley (b), contains "the admissions of the parties to the facts therein stated," and this is on the same footing with pleadings, which contain the statement of the question agreed upon by the parties. It should, therefore, be amendable, as pleadings are. [Lord Denman C. J. Suppose you prevailed upon the Judge to amend, how would the amended case bind the other party without his consent? We cannot amend.] The meaning of the case cannot be taken to be, that the consent of the husband, in every instance, must be expressed in the surrender, in order to make it binding. Otherwise it would follow that, if the case expressly found the consent, still the surrender could not bind, unless the consent were expressed on the face of it; but a custom to that extent could not be supported. Now here, as to the surrender of 1782, the husband is a party, and consenting, if his assignees represent him. That depends upon the evidence of his bankruptcy, which is completely made out by the deeds of January and February 1796. It will be argued that the defendant was no party to the deed of January; but he is a party to that of February, which conveys an interest to himself, and which, as it rests entirely upon the deed of January, must be considered as forming one conveyance with it. The surrender of 1782 is therefore binding. Then the wife, having a reversionary interest, makes the surrender in 1803. The husband is not, indeed, stated to be a party to that surrender; but he is present in Court: and, supposing this by itself not to be evidence of his consent, it is ground for presuming his consent, if the consent be indispensable. Here too there is an admission, following up the surrender; and this, in default of negative evidence, shews that all was done which was requisite to perfect the conveyance. In Scamon v. Maw (a), though there was no special custom, a surrender by the wife alone to the use of her husband was considered to be good, his assent being presumed from his being present in court, and being afterwards admitted. The absence of an entry of the husband's consent on the rolls, cannot be insisted upon with respect to the surrender of 1803, since the court rolls are not complete for that time. It cannot, therefore, be assumed that he was not a party.

But, further, the want of the husband's consent cannot be insisted upon by the defendant, who claims as heir to the wife. The wife herself could not have taken the objection; it is for the husband alone, or those claiming under him (a). Again, though, independently of any special custom, a surrender by consent of the husband will pass an estate as against both husband and wife, and not without such consent, yet the consent of the husband is necessary only where he has some interest in the property, and only in consequence of such interest. In Watkins on Copyholds, p. 63 (b), it is said, "As the husband becomes, on marriage, entitled to the profits of the wife's copyholds, during her life, and often by custom, during his own, it would be unreasonable that the wife should be suffered to deprive him of them by force of a particular custom, without his consent: it has therefore been determined, that a custom for a feme covert to surrender without such consent cannot be supported." For this Stevens dem. Wise v. Tyrrell (c) is cited. But it is added, "But where a copyhold is settled on a wife for her own separate use, it does not fall within the reasons of the last case, and therefore she may surrender it without her husband. And where the wife is not entitled to her separate use, yet a surrender of the copyhold by her alone, with the consent of her husband, would be good. And if the husband be present at such a surrender, it will be sufficient proof of his assent. So, if the husband and wife agree to live separate, and the husband thereupon covenants that the wife shall therefore enjoy to her own use her real estates, &c., after such covenant her surrender shall be taken to be with his assent; and by custom such a surrender is good, as appears in Moore, 123" (a). Here the husband had been a bankrupt; and afterwards, in 1782, had given up whatever interest he had to Wood, during the joint lives of himself and his wife; and, after her death, by the custom, he was not entitled to curtesy. In Compton v. Collinson (b) the husband was separated by deed from his wife, and had covenanted that she should enjoy her estates to her own use, and that he would join her in levying a fine, or suffering a recovery, and limiting to such uses as she should appoint: and it was held that she might, without a special custom, surrender without his consent: and Lord Loughborough illustrated the case by the law of fines, saying, "it has been settled ever since the case in the 17 Ed. 3. (c), that if a fine be levied by a feme covert without her husband, it shall bind her and her heirs, if it be not avoided by the husband." Compton v. Collinson (b) has been questioned as to some part of the grounds of decision; but the principle assumed in it, that the husband's assent is necessary only by virtue of his interest, has not been shaken. The want of interest, too, is also an additional reason for presuming his consent, if necessary. The custom here, of expressing the consent of the husband on the surrender, can be applicable only to cases where the consent is required by the ordinary copyhold law: if more was meant, the case should have expressed it.

Maule contra. The custom is expressly stated to be that the consent of the husband must be expressed in the surrender and admission; and nothing has been shewn which renders such a custom bad. Indeed, the points which have been raised, as to presuming the consent, sufficiently shew that such a custom is convenient and reasonable, as it will prevent estates from being devested by matter not in writing, or by vague recollections, and presumptions of fact. The surrender of 1803 is invalid for want of the husband's consent, expressed on the surrender. It cannot be said that the court rolls are not extant: they are extant, and not defaced; they are however incomplete, so far as relates to any entry of the husband's consent, and the minutes of the steward do not aid this. Even the presence of the husband at the surrender does not appear; but only that, at some part of the time during which the court was held, he was there. Then it is argued that no consent at all is necessary, unless the husband be interested. This in reality amounts to saying that a wife may bind herself in every case where the husband has no interest; as, for instance, that she may convey a remainder expectant upon the death of her husband, — a proposition clearly untenable. The restriction upon the acts of a married woman belongs in reality, not to the law of property, but to the marital law: the husband is to govern the wife's discretion. Besides, the issue by the father is interested. Watkins certainly lays down a principle similar to that contended for, as to the ordinary copyhold law. But here the custom is express and general. Besides, if a custom be not against reason, it is not to be restrained to that which may be considered to be the reason of its origin; for customs often extend beyond the principle in which they originate. With respect to Compton v. Collinson (a), its authority is questionable, as appears by Mr. Eden's note on the case, in Bro. Ch. Ca. (b), and from Scriven on Copyholds, Part I. ch. 4. (c), citing Bramhall v. Hall (d). There too the husband had expressly parted with the power over the wife's estate. And the wife surrendered, in that case, as a feme sole: but here she is named as the wife of Brown Shelton. The analogy of a fine is very questionable. The effect of a fine is derived from statute: and it may be asked at what period of the law the analogy is to commence? Whether at the statute De finibus levatis (e), or that of 32 H. 8. c. 36.? No point of time, in the progress of the law of fines, can be fixed, at which a surrender of a copyhold by a married woman, and a fine levied by her, can be referred to the same principle. The suggestion, that the consent of the husband may be presumed from the admission having taken effect, cannot be supported. Wood was copyholder up to the time of the surrender, and was admitted on the surrender, but he does not appear to have taken possession: and the wife resided on the premises till her death; so that no change took place.

Then it is argued, that the husband's consent may be presumed from his having no interest. This is no ground of presumption. And, moreover, the assumption that he had no interest is founded on the evidence of the bankruptcy, which rests only on the deeds of January and February 1796. The first only of these mentions the bankruptcy, and the defendant is no party to that. He does execute the second; but that does not make the first evidence against him: the second deed does not refer to the first, nor in any way connect the defendant with it, or with the facts recited in it. And even if it let in the evidence of the first, that would come to no more than an admission by the defendant, that a commission of bankruptcy had been awarded against his father: there would be no admission of the trading, act of bankruptcy, and other essentials to the title of the assignees. Parties disputing a bankruptcy frequently admit the commission.

Further, the consent of the assignees to the deed of 1782 is of no effect: the custom requires a special consent by attorney. The authority of an attorney is revocable by the party constituting him; that of assignees extends to what the bankrupt might not consent to. The deed of 1782 is therefore wholly inoperative, and so is the surrender of 1803. That being so, there is no surrender; and the property could pass only by surrender, otherwise the lord's rights would be prejudiced.

Sir W. W. Follett, Solicitor-General, in reply. The defendant professes to exercise a dominion over the property in the deed of February 1796; and, that being so, he admits all that was requisite to pass the title to him; therefore, not the commission merely, but all the essentials of the bankruptcy are recognised by him. The concurrence of the assignees in the surrender shews the same facts.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.

This was an action of ejectment, brought on the demise of (amongst others) Thomas Wood Roberts, heir at law of Thomas Wood, for certain copyhold tenements of the manor of Bromyard and Bromyard Foreign, to which Thomas Wood had been admitted, on a surrender from Mary the wife of Brown Shelton in 1803. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff (whose title depended on the validity of that surrender), subject to the opinion of this Court on the following state of facts.

It does not appear, in the case, that T. Wood had ever taken possession of the premises surrendered to him, nor in what manner or when the defendant had obtained such possession. His mother died in 1821.

Various arguments were urged on behalf of the plaintiff to shew that the surrender might be valid, though the husband's consent was not expressed in it. The terms in which the custom is set forth were analysed to prove that, as the nullity arose from the want of consent, not from the want of its being expressed, parol proof of the consent might be received, and appeared on the case to have been given. But, supposing this refined construction to prevail, the fact of consent is not stated in the case. Circumstances are indeed detailed from which a jury might be called upon to infer infer that fact, and liberty is given to the Court to make any inference that a jury ought to have drawn. We must, however, decline this office: we cannot undertake to say whether a jury ought or ought not to have drawn that inference from the facts of the case: we rather think the contrary; more particularly where the party admitted tenant by the steward does not appear to have at any time taken possession under his admission.

But we are far from acquiescing in the proposition asserted at the bar, that a custom requiring the expression of consent on the face of the surrender would be void in law. There seems to be good reason for requiring the best evidence of that which is made essential to the validity of the act done, and that that evidence should accompany the act itself.

We were also told, that the law itself would presume that the custom was complied with to prevent the surrender from being invalidated. Such presumption possibly might be made by way of estoppel against one claiming under the surrender, but surely not against him who denies its efficacy. Besides, when the nature of this custom is considered, proof that no consent was formally expressed must be taken as strong evidence that none was given. It really appears to me that the law might as well presume a seal, where the form of a bond was produced and no seal appeared.

The plaintiff's main reliance was, however, placed on the necessity of restricting the custom to those cases where the husband has a personal interest in the wife's estate, which is said not to exist in him under the circumstances. For as, by the custom of the manor, he does not become tenant by the curtesy, and as in this case he is said to have been divested, at the time of the surrender, of all interest during his wife's life, it is argued, that there was nothing in him on which his consent could have operated, and, therefore, the custom could not apply to a person in his situation.

Whether a Court could be justified in engrafting on a positive custom an implied exception, having reference to the principle in which it may believe the custom to have originated, seems to be a very questionable point; but it is one which we are not here required to determine. The custom, exacting the husband's consent to an alienation of property by the wife, is found to be general, and must have universal operation, unless we clearly saw that, carried beyond the line of restriction drawn in the argument for the plaintiff, it would become unreasonable and absurd. But we find no such ground for cutting down this custom, which may have been founded on the desire to protect, not only the husband's interest, but that of the wife herself, and of her family, by constituting her husband and the father of their common offspring the guardian of both.

But, even if the custom could be so limited, the fact of the husband being stripped of all interest in her property during her life, is neither stated in the case, nor to be collected from the facts appearing. Of all the circumstances put forward for this purpose, not one amounts to satisfactory proof. The surrender in 1782, said to be made by Brown Shelton, by persons calling themselves his "assignees duly appointed," makes no mention of a bankruptcy. It cannot bind him as the act of his attorney, not only on account of the custom for stating in the surrender the due appointment of such attorney, but for want of all proof of authority from him.

The fact of the surrender might, however, be established against the defendant quoad the bankrupt's interest, if the bankruptcy and the assigneeship should be proved against him by other evidence. Recourse is now had to the two deeds of 1796: the former of which, reciting a sale to have taken place under a commission of bankruptcy duly awarded and issued against Brown Shelton, conveys to the defendant lands sold thereunder by the assignees; by the latter, the defendant, acting upon that conveyance, executes a settlement of them upon himself after his mother's death. The former deed, however, which recites the bankruptcy, &c. is not executed by the defendant; and that which is, is silent respecting the bankruptcy. There is, consequently, no direct estoppel. He is said to have recognised and adopted the whole of the former deed, by thus executing the latter. But is it true, as a general proposition, that a party so claiming adopts the statement of facts in an anterior deed, which go to make up his title? We are aware of no authority for such a doctrine. It is also remarkable, that the defendant is not stated to have had any enjoyment of the property, the subject-matter of these deeds, though possibly that would have made no difference. But it is material to add that, even if the bankruptcy, &c. had been regularly and strictly proved, so as to give validity to the surrender in 1782 of all the bankrupt's interest in his wife's estate, he may possibly have become a new man in 1803, when his wife surrendered the estate in fee then vested in her in possession by her father's death. If the bankrupt had been the party to the suit, the burthen of proving such a fact might have been cast upon him; but, I apprehend, the law makes no presumption on the subject against this defendant, who, though the bankrupt's son, does not claim under him.

Upon the whole, then, we think that the plaintiff has not succeeded in making out his title upon the facts brought before us, and that our judgment must be for the defendant.

The KING against The Lord of the Hundred of MILVERTON.

On motion in Michaelmas term, 1834, (made more than a month after old Michaelmas-day,) for a mandamus to compel the lord of a hundred to hold a court leet forthwith, to appoint officers, the lord contended that he could hold it only in October; and it appeared that the court had, as far as was remembered, been held in every October until the October preceding the application, when no court was held. It was not shewn whether the leet was by charter or prescription, nor did any party swear to his belief that the leet could be held only in October. The Court, in the absence of such evidence, granted the mandamus, in Easter term, 1835, twenty-two days after Easter Sunday.

DUNDAS had obtained a rule in Michaelmas term last, 24th November 1834, calling on the lord of the hundred or district of Milverton, and the steward for the time being of the court leet there, to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding them forthwith to hold a court leet for the said hundred or district, and to take all legal steps necessary for the purpose of choosing and appointing thereat high constables, constables and tything men, and all such other officers as ought by law to be chosen at such court, and to do and transact the other lawful business of the said court. The affidavits in support of the rule stated that, as long as the deponents could recollect, courts leet for the district had been held in October, until October 1834, when the present lord neglected to hold one; he had, however, held one since he had become lord, in October 1833. It did not appear whether the leet existed by prescription or charter. The officers named in the rule had always been chosen at the court. The lord of the manor, and his attorney, both made affidavits in opposition to the rule; but no deponent on either side stated that there was either prescription or charter confining the times for holding the leet to October. The lord had been applied to to hold the court, but he had taken no steps in consequence of the application; neither did it appear that he had expressly refused to hold the court.

Sir W. W. Follett now shewed cause. The application is for a mandamus to compel the holding of the court “forthwith;” but such a mandamus ought not to be granted, unless it appear that the holding of the court will be effectual. It will not be so unless held at the proper time. Now the proper time appears to be in October. But, if the affidavits do not go far enough to show a ground for presuming a charter or prescription by which the holding is limited to that month, then, by the equity of Magna Charta (a), it should take place within a month after Easter (b), or a month after Michaelmas; Com. Dig. Leet (c); Dakin’s Case (c), Gryffyth v. Biddle (d). Officers could not be legally appointed at a court irregularly held. The utmost that could be done would be to compel the holding of the court in October next; but, as the lord has not absolutely refused, that cannot be done in the present case. In a case respecting the Merchant Tailors’ Company, this Court held that a mandamus should not issue to the master and wardens to elect officers according to the charters, the proper time not having arrived, and

Sir F. Pollock, in support of the rule. Practically, the question is, whether this court leet is ever to be held at all; for, if the Court will not grant the mandamus to hold at the proper time, before that time arrives, and if, after the time has past, the mandamus cannot be granted to hold at any other time, there are no means of enforcing the performance of the duty, and the objection would destroy the general power of this Court to enforce the holding of courts leets by mandamus, which power is, however, proved by the authorities (b). If the lord insist upon the limitation as to time, he should depose to the existence of such a limitation distinctly; otherwise, the Court will at least put him to return it.

Per Curiam (c) (stopping Sir G. A. Lewin on the same side). We may at least say that it is doubtful whether any charter or prescription exist, limiting the time. Where neither the party, nor his attorney, swears to the belief of such a limitation, we cannot assume it. Great public inconvenience might accrue, if a mandamus were refused on such grounds.

The KING against CLARK and AUSTEN.Tuesday,
May 12th.

THE defendants were indicted for assaulting Francis Grinder, a peace-officer, in the due execution of his duty. There was also a count for a common assault. On the trial before Gaselee J., at the last Sussex assizes, the facts proved were these. Charles Tipper, a collector of land-tax, had applied to the defendant Clark, on the 28th of October 1833, for 8*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, due from Clark for arrears of land-tax, which had been repeatedly demanded before. At the time of this application, Tipper was accompanied by a constable named John Collins. Clark, in answer to Tipper's application, said, "I suppose, if I do not pay it, you are going to distrain." Tipper replied, that he probably should; to which Clark answered, "If you put your hand upon a thing, I will split your skull." Tipper said he had no fear of that. Clark then promised to send the money on the following Saturday, but did not do so. On the 29th of November following, Tipper went to Clark's house (which was an hotel), and entered a room in it, with Collins, and again demanded the arrears. Tipper, on this occasion, took with him, also, Grinder and a third constable, and desired the two last to remain outside of the house, and "to be on the alert, lest there should be a row." As soon as the demand was made, Clark quitted the room, and directly afterwards he was heard to fasten the house door. Upon this, Collins, by Tipper's order, unfastened the door, and brought in Grinder and the other constable. Clark soon afterwards returned into the room with bank notes in his hand, accompanied by ten or twelve men, among whom was the defendant Austen. Clark asked what Grinder did there; and Collins answered, that Grinder was there to aid and assist if required. Upon this, Clark said, "I will not pay the taxes till the thief-catcher has left the room." Grinder refused to depart, upon which Clark desired Austen to put him out, saying that he would be answerable. Austen then attempted to force Grinder out of the room, and in so doing committed the assault in question. Clark afterwards paid the taxes with the notes in his hand. For the defendants it was objected, that it did not appear that Grinder, at the time of the assault, was entitled to be in the house; that he was, therefore, not in the execution of his duty as peace-officer; and that the defendants were justified in removing him forcibly. The learned Judge left it to the jury to say, whether Tipper introduced Grinder for the purpose of keeping the peace, and desired them, if they thought he did so, to find a verdict of guilty. The jury found in the affirmative upon the question left, and convicted both the defendants. His lordship gave leave to move that this verdict should be set aside, and a verdict entered for the defendants. In the present term, April 23d, Andrews Serjt. obtained a rule accordingly.

A collector of the land-tax is not entitled, either under the provisions of stat. 38 G. 3. c. 5. s. 17., or under his general authority, to take a constable with him into the house of a person from whom he is demanding payment of the arrear of the land-tax. But if he has reasonable ground (from past or present circumstances) to apprehend violence from such person, he may call in constables to assist in keeping the peace, and such constables are justified in staying while the collector remains to be paid, as long as there is reason to expect violence; and, if the owner of the house use violence to remove them, he is indictable for assaulting a peace-officer in the execution of his duty.

Platt and G. F. Jones now shewed cause. The seventeenth section of the Land Tax Act, 38 G. 3. c. 5. (a), authorises the collectors to call in the aid and assistance assistance of constables when any refusal or neglect of payment shall have taken place; and that which had passed in the present case fully amounted to neglect and refusal. It cannot be fairly contended that the provisions of the act apply to cases only where the collector is going to break open houses or chests. Had that been intended, the provision would probably have been, that "it shall be lawful for the collector calling to his assistance the constables," &c., "to break open," &c.: but, instead of this, the provision as to calling in the assistance of the constables occurs at the end of the section, and must refer to all the steps directed to be taken throughout the section. act provides for the case where the lands or houses are unoccupied, and no distress can be found on the premises, and there the "collectors, constables, or tithing men" are to distrain at any time after. There can be no reason for interpreting the provisions of these two sections differently. Independently of the statute, the mere fact of the apprehension of a breach of the peace authorised the collector to take with him a constable to preserve the peace; and the constable was bound to attend for that purpose. A constable might interfere if a breach of the peace was apprehended, though a private individual could not: and it is upon this principle that stat. 1 G. 4. c. 37. s. 1. authorises the appointment of special constables, not merely in cases of actual tumult, riot, or felony, but on reasonable apprehension thereof. At all events, the count for a common assault may be supported; for a collector is justified in taking an assistant with him, otherwise no collector could perform his duty.

Andrews Serjt., and Long, in support of the rule. The statutory provision in stat. 38 G. 3. c. 5. s. 17. confines the power of the collector to take constables with him to the special cases provided for in that section, that is to say, when a house or chest is to be broken open. The sense of the previous enactments terminates before the words "and moreover," at which the provisions connected with the power to call in the constables commence. And, even if it were not so, it ought to have been shewn, on the part of the prosecutors, that the collector had a warrant to distrain. [Patteson J. The act gives the collector a general power to distrain: a special warrant is not necessary.]

At

At any rate he ought to have had the book of assessments with him. [Patteson J. That is unnecessary. Coleridge J. Do you mean to contend that he must take the warrant with him whenever he does any act in his character of collector?] That would, perhaps, not be necessary in the case of a mere demand. Then, as to the charge at common law. There was no evidence of an intention to resist the enforcing of payment; on the contrary, Clark appears to have gone for the purpose of bringing the money, and actually to have brought it. No distress would have been justifiable at all under these circumstances: at any rate, Tipper had no right, before there had been resistance of any kind, to introduce the three constables into the house; one of whom was even brought in before the demand was made. And Clark had a right, at the time of his paying the money, to insist upon the constables quitting the house. If so, he was justified in removing them forcibly, and in calling in help to do so; and this is an answer to both counts.

The KING
against
CLARK.

LORD DENMAN C. J. The question is, whether this was an assault, committed by the two defendants upon Grinder, in the execution of his duty as a peace-officer. It appears that Grinder was a constable, and that he was brought to the premises by the collector Tipper. Tipper, on the 28th of October, had been threatened by Clark, in the event of his distraining. On the 29th of November, Tipper went again to Clark's, accompanied, as he had been on the former occasion, by the constable Collins. No objection was made, either then or before, to Tipper's taking Collins with him. On the second occasion, he took with him also Grinder and another constable, tials of the bankruptcy are recognised by him. The concurrence of the assignees in the surrender shews the same facts.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.

This was an action of ejectment, brought on the demise of (amongst others) Thomas Wood Roberts, heir at law of Thomas Wood, for certain copyhold tenements of the manor of Bromyard and Bromyard Foreign, to which Thomas Wood had been admitted, on a surrender from Mary the wife of Brown Shelton in 1803. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff (whose title depended on the validity of that surrender), subject to the opinion of this Court on the following state of facts.

It does not appear, in the case, that T. Wood had ever taken possession of the premises surrendered to him, nor in what manner or when the defendant had obtained such possession. His mother died in 1821.

Various arguments were urged on behalf of the plaintiff to shew that the surrender might be valid, though the husband's consent was not expressed in it. The terms in which the custom is set forth were analysed to prove that, as the nullity arose from the want of consent, not from the want of its being expressed, parol proof of the consent might be received, and appeared on the case to have been given. But, supposing this refined construction to prevail, the fact of consent is not stated in the case. Circumstances are indeed detailed from which a jury might be called upon to infer infer that fact, and liberty is given to the Court to make any inference that a jury ought to have drawn. We must, however, decline this office: we cannot undertake to say whether a jury ought or ought not to have drawn that inference from the facts of the case: we rather think the contrary; more particularly where the party admitted tenant by the steward does not appear to have at any time taken possession under his admission.

But we are far from acquiescing in the proposition asserted at the bar, that a custom requiring the expression of consent on the face of the surrender would be void in law. There seems to be good reason for requiring the best evidence of that which is made essential to the validity of the act done, and that that evidence should accompany the act itself.

We were also told, that the law itself would presume that the custom was complied with to prevent the surrender from being invalidated. Such presumption possibly might be made by way of estoppel against one claiming under the surrender, but surely not against him who denies its efficacy. Besides, when the nature of this custom is considered, proof that no consent was formally expressed must be taken as strong evidence that none was given. It really appears to me that the law might as well presume a seal, where the form of a bond was produced and no seal appeared.

The plaintiff's main reliance was, however, placed on the necessity of restricting the custom to those cases where the husband has a personal interest in the wife's estate, which is said not to exist in him under the circumstances. For as, by the custom of the manor, he does not become tenant by the curtesy, and as in this case he is said to have been divested, at the time of the surrender, of all interest during his wife's life, it is argued, that there was nothing in him on which his consent could have operated, and, therefore, the custom could not apply to a person in his situation.

Whether a Court could be justified in engrafting on a positive custom an implied exception, having reference to the principle in which it may believe the custom to have originated, seems to be a very questionable point; but it is one which we are not here required to determine. The custom, exacting the husband's consent to an alienation of property by the wife, is found to be general, and must have universal operation, unless we clearly saw that, carried beyond the line of restriction drawn in the argument for the plaintiff, it would become unreasonable and absurd. But we find no such ground for cutting down this custom, which may have been founded on the desire to protect, not only the husband's interest, but that of the wife herself, and of her family, by constituting her husband and the father of their common offspring the guardian of both.

But, even if the custom could be so limited, the fact of the husband being stripped of all interest in her property during her life, is neither stated in the case, nor to be collected from the facts appearing. Of all the circumstances put forward for this purpose, not one amounts to satisfactory proof. The surrender in 1782, said to be made by Brown Shelton, by persons calling themselves his "assignees duly appointed," makes no mention of a bankruptcy. It cannot bind him as the act of his attorney, not only on account of the custom for stating in the surrender the due appointment of such attorney, but for want of all proof of authority from him.

The fact of the surrender might, however, be established against the defendant quoad the bankrupt's interest, if the bankruptcy and the assigneeship should be proved against him by other evidence. Recourse is now had to the two deeds of 1796: the former of which, reciting a sale to have taken place under a commission of bankruptcy duly awarded and issued against Brown Shelton, conveys to the defendant lands sold thereunder by the assignees; by the latter, the defendant, acting upon that conveyance, executes a settlement of them upon himself after his mother's death. The former deed, however, which recites the bankruptcy, &c. is not executed by the defendant; and that which is, is silent respecting the bankruptcy. There is, consequently, no direct estoppel. He is said to have recognised and adopted the whole of the former deed, by thus executing the latter. But is it true, as a general proposition, that a party so claiming adopts the statement of facts in an anterior deed, which go to make up his title? We are aware of no authority for such a doctrine. It is also remarkable, that the defendant is not stated to have had any enjoyment of the property, the subject-matter of these deeds, though possibly that would have made no difference. But it is material to add that, even if the bankruptcy, &c. had been regularly and strictly proved, so as to give validity to the surrender in 1782 of all the bankrupt's interest in his wife's estate, he may possibly have become a new man in 1803, when his wife surrendered the estate in fee then vested in her in possession by her father's death. If the bankrupt had been the party to the suit, the burthen of proving such a fact might have been cast upon him; but, I apprehend, the law makes no presumption on the subject against this

The utmost that could be done would be to compel the holding of the court in October next; but, as the lord has not absolutely refused, that cannot be done in the present case. In a case respecting the Merchant Tailors’ Company, this Court held that a mandamus should not issue to the master and wardens to elect officers according to the charters, the proper time not having arrived, and the Court not knowing that the parties would not at that time proceed regularly (a).

Sir F. Pollock, in support of the rule. Practically, the question is, whether this court leet is ever to be held at all; for, if the Court will not grant the mandamus to hold at the proper time, before that time arrives, and if, after the time has past, the mandamus cannot be granted to hold at any other time, there are no means of enforcing the performance of the duty, and the objection would destroy the general power of this Court to enforce the holding of courts leets by mandamus, which power is, however, proved by the authorities (b). If the lord insist upon the limitation as to time, he should depose to the existence of such a limitation distinctly; otherwise, the Court will at least put him to return it.

Per Curiam (c) (stopping Sir G. A. Lewin on the same side). We may at least say that it is doubtful whether any charter or prescription exist, limiting the time. Where neither the party, nor his attorney, swears to the belief of such a limitation, we cannot assume it. Great public inconvenience might accrue, if a mandamus were refused on such grounds.

THE defendants were indicted for assaulting Francis Grinder, a peace-officer, in the due execution of his duty. There was also a count for a common assault. On the trial before Gaselee J., at the last Sussex assizes, the facts proved were these. Charles Tipper, a collector of land-tax, had applied to the defendant Clark, on the 28th of October 1833, for 8*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, due from Clark for arrears of land-tax, which had been repeatedly demanded before. At the time of this application, Tipper was accompanied by a constable named John Collins. Clark, in answer to Tipper's application, said, "I suppose, if I do not pay it, you are going to distrain." Tipper replied, that he probably should; to which Clark answered, "If you put your hand upon a thing, I will split your skull." Tipper said he had no fear of that. Clark then promised to send the money on the following Saturday, but did not do so. On the 29th of November following, Tipper went to Clark's house (which was an hotel), and entered a room in it, with Collins, and again demanded the arrears. Tipper, on this occasion, took with him, also, Grinder and a third constable, and desired the two last to remain outside of the house, and "to be on the alert, lest there should be a row." As soon as the demand was made, Clark quitted the room, and directly afterwards he was heard to fasten the house door. Upon this, Collins, by Tipper's order, unfastened the door, and brought in Grinder and the other constable. Clark soon afterwards returned into the room with bank notes in his hand, accompanied by ten or twelve men, among whom was the defendant Austen. Clark asked what Grinder did there; and Collins answered, that Grinder was there to aid and assist if required. Upon this, Clark said, "I will not pay the taxes till the thief-catcher has left the room." Grinder refused to depart, upon which Clark desired Austen to put him out, saying that he would be answerable. Austen then attempted to force Grinder out of the room, and in so doing committed the assault in question. Clark afterwards paid the taxes with the notes in his hand. For the defendants it was objected, that it did not appear that Grinder, at the time of the assault, was entitled to be in the house; that he was, therefore, not in the execution of his duty as peace-officer; and that the defendants were justified in removing him forcibly. The learned Judge left it to the jury to say, whether Tipper introduced Grinder for the purpose of keeping the peace, and desired them, if they thought he did so, to find a verdict of guilty. The jury found in the affirmative upon the question left, and convicted both the defendants. His lordship gave leave to move that this verdict should be set aside, and a verdict entered for the defendants. In the present term, April 23d, Andrews Serjt. obtained a rule accordingly.

A collector of the land-tax is not entitled, either under the provisions of stat. 38 G. 3. c. 5. s. 17., or under his general authority, to take a constable with him into the house of a person from whom he is demanding payment of the arrears of the land-tax. But if he has reasonable ground (from past or present circumstances) to apprehend violence from such person, he may call in constables to assist in keeping the peace, and such constables are justified in staying while the collector remains to be paid, as long as there is reason to expect violence; and, if the owner of the house use violence to remove them, he is indictable for assaulting a peace-officer in the execution of his duty.

Platt and G. F. Jones now shewed cause. The seventeenth section of the Land Tax Act, 38 G. 3. c. 5. (a), authorises the collectors to call in the aid and assistance

(a) Made perpetual by stat. 38 G. 3. c. 60. s. 1. Sect. 17. of 38 G. 3. c. 5. is as follows: — "And whereas doubts have arisen touching the authority of collectors to distrain for nonpayment of the land-tax under the warrant usually granted by commissioners at the time of their appointments;

It cannot be fairly contended that the provisions of the act apply to cases only where the collector is going to break open houses or chests. Had that been intended, the provision would probably have been, that "it shall be lawful for the collector calling to his assistance the constables," &c., "to break open," &c.: but, instead of this, the provision as to calling in the assistance of the constables occurs at the end of the section, and must refer to all the steps directed to be taken throughout the section. PATTERSON J. As soon as it is found, in such a case as this, to be a matter of difficulty to say whether the agreement is determined or not, there is an end of the question, because the object of the reference was, to have it settled whether or not the agreement should be ended. The umpire should have shewn that by his award. By the terms of the reference, proceedings were to be stayed until the time for making the award, when, if no award should be made, either party should be at liberty to proceed. But that implied that the arbitrators, if they made an award, should determine whether the suit should proceed or not. At the same time, if the arbitrator had determined that the agreement should be rescinded, and had also ordered each party to pay his own costs, I should have been inclined to think that the suit was put an end to (b).

ASSUMPSIT upon a policy of insurance on the ship Crisis (a). Plea, non assumpsit. At the trial before Lord Lyndhurst C. B., at the Spring assizes for Surrey, 1834, the following facts appeared:—The plaintiff and defendant were members of a mutual insurance society, called The British Association of London. The ship was proposed and accepted for insurance in February 1829, when the premium was paid; and the insurance purported to be (lost or not lost) on the body, &c, of the ship, from the 15th of February 1829, to the 15th of February 1830. The policy was formally executed on the 21st of October 1829, by Mr. Scott, an agent for the defendant, conformably to the rules of the society, and appeared not to have been stamped till the time of execution. By the practice of the society, policies used to be filled up and delivered out as members applied for them. Before the 21st of October, an average loss, for which this action was brought, had happened; and the loss had, before that day, become known to the plaintiff and defendant. No fraud was imputed.

By the first of the society's rules, it was provided that the sums to be insured should be from 500*l.* to 1200*l.* on each ship, to commence on the day of her being

A policy of insurance on a ship, lost or not lost, is good, the ship having been accepted for insurance, and the premium paid, before loss, although the policy was not actually executed and stamped till loss had happened, and both insurer and assured knew it.

By the rules of a mutual insurance society, with which the above insurance was effected, the insurance on a ship was to commence on the day of her being accepted as insurable, and to continue in force twelve months. A member of the society gave a power of attorney to his agent, to insure ships for him under the terms, restrictions, and regulations by which the society might be governed: Held, that the power (though it did not refer to the case of a vessel being lost, and though such a case was not expressly provided for in the regulations of the society) was special enough to warrant the agent in executing the above-mentioned policy for the principal as insurer, after a loss had happened within the knowledge of all the parties, as before stated.

accepted by the committee, and to continue in force for twelve months from that time, the assured paying 5s. per cent. on the sum insured, towards defraying the necessary expenses, also the charge for policies and power of attorney, and two guineas for survey. By rule 20, a committee was appointed, of whom Scott was one, for settling averages, and managing the affairs of the association. In executing the above-mentioned policy, Scott acted for the defendant under a power of attorney, the practice of the society being for the members of the committee to act under powers of attorney for the several members of the society. By the instrument in question, the defendant, described therein as of South Shields, ship-owner, appointed Scott, described as of the Coal Exchange, London, ship-owner, and three others, his attornies and attorney, for him and in his name, &c., "to insure, underwrite, and subscribe any policy or policies for insuring any ship or vessel, or ships or vessels, from and against all perils and dangers of the seas and waters, both in and out of harbour, laden or unladen, and from fire," &c., "and from all other perils, losses, and misfortunes whatsoever, in and for such sums or sum of money, and upon such voyage or voyages, and under such terms, restrictions, and regulations as are annexed to the policies, and any others by which a certain society, called The British Association for the mutual Insurance of Shipping, may be governed, hereby ratifying, allowing, and confirming all and whatsoever my said attorneys and attorney, or either of them, shall lawfully do or cause to be done in the premises by virtue of these presents."

It was objected that no action could be sustained upon a policy executed after the loss had taken place within the knowledge of the parties; and that, at all events, events, a general power of attorney like that above mentioned could not authorise an agent to effect a policy after such known loss. The Lord Chief Baron nonsuited the plaintiff, giving leave to move to set the nonsuit aside, and enter a verdict for the plaintiff. A rule nisi was obtained accordingly, against which Thesiger and F. D. M. Dawson shewed cause in this term (a). The question, whether or not an assured can recover on a policy effected after a loss known both to him and to the insurer, has never yet been decided. Insurance is a contract of indemnity against possible loss; it is inconsistent with the nature of such a contract, that it should be entered into after the loss is known. The words "lost or not lost" make no difference; they are usually inserted in policies where the parties are in ignorance of the event, and apply to such a case, but not to this. The effect of this expression is discussed in Jefferyes v. Legendra (b) (in argument), and in The Earl of March v. Pigot (c). In the latter case, a bet upon survivorship between the fathers of the wagering parties was held to be good, though Mr. Pigot's father was dead at the time of the bet; one of the grounds of decision was, that neither party knew of that event. The contract here was no policy until the 21st of October. By stat. 35 G. 3. c. 63. s. 11., every contract of insurance, subject to duty under that act, must be "ingrossed, printed, or written," and must have, specified upon it, the particulars there pointed out; and Roderick v. Hovil (d) and Warwick v. Slade (e) shew that, even if the terms be reduced to writing, the policy is null, unless it was duly stamped before it was effected. If the contrary were held in cases like the present, the parties might agree that their policies should never be stamped till after loss, and so defeat the statute. The society appoint a committee to subscribe policies, in order that they may exercise a judgment in doubtful cases; it would be idle to establish such a body with a power to sign policies after the ships were lost. Then, as to the terms of the power of attorney in this case, it evidently contemplates an authority to insure against losses that may happen, according to the general tenor of such policies. There are no words conferring a power to insure after loss, which is out of the usual course, and requires a special authority.

Platt, contra. The power of attorney is, expressly, to subscribe policies under the terms, restrictions, and regulations by which this society may be governed: it therefore authorised an insurance after loss, which might be effected under the rule of the association directing that the insurance shall commence from the day of the ship being accepted, and continue in force twelve months. Here the ship was accepted as insurable in February, though the policy was not filled up till October. If, at that time, only one of the parties had known of the loss, the question might have been different; but, both knowing it, there is no illegality in the transaction on either side. The words "lost or not lost," expressly refer to the case of a ship being actually lost at the time; her not being lost is not of the essence of the policy, nor does the knowledge or ignorance of the parties make it more or less so. As to the effect of the stamp act, it is sufficient, within the terms of the statute, that the policy was stamped when executed. It is said that, if this construction were to prevail, policies would not be stamped till a loss happened; but then the parties would have no security but in each other's honour for the performance of their respective engagements; it is not likely, therefore, that such a course would be adopted.

Cur. adv. vult.

This was an action on a policy of insurance on the plaintiff's ship. He and the defendant were members of an association for mutual insurance. The ship was accepted in February 1829, when the premium was paid, and the insurance was to be from that period for twelve months from that date. The policy was formally executed in October 1829, and that, not by the defendant himself, but under a power of attorney, and according to the rules of the society; and the ship was in fact lost, and known by all parties to be so, before the execution of the policy. On these facts being proved, Lord Lyndhurst directed a nonsuit, on a rule for setting which aside, and entering a verdict for the plaintiff, the case has been fully argued before us.

The material question was, whether an assured can recover on a policy executed after the loss had accrued, and become known to both parties. Now the case of The Earl of March v. Pigot (a), referred to in the argument, is a direct authority in principle in favour of the right to recover, if the loss was known to neither party at the time of effecting the policy. According to the same case, and indeed on the plainest general principles, if the loss had been known to the assured only, the policy would be void. But no case has determined that an underwriter who chooses to effect a policy, with full knowledge that the loss has actually happened, may not be bound by it. His conduct might indeed appear extraordinary, if it were not clear that he had a good legal consideration for entering into the contract, viz. the payment of the premium, which may be regarded as a price actually given and received for the underwriter's indemnity against the contingency that has arisen. There is considerable analogy between this case and Paine v. Meller (a), decided in 1801 by Lord Eldon, who held the purchaser bound to perform his contract, though the house was burnt before the time appointed for conveying it. "As to the mere effect of the accident itself," said his Lordship, "no solid objection can be founded upon that simply; for if the party by the contract has become in equity the owner of the premises, they are his to all intents and purposes" (b). He also said, advertng to the case of annuities, where the purchasers have been compelled to pay the purchase money, though the grantor die before he has made a single payment, "the party has the thing he bought, though no payment may have been made; for he bought subject to contingency." So, in the present case, he bought and paid for the underwriter's promise to indemnify. If his ship had arrived, the underwriter would have kept the whole premium: though she has perished, he cannot be relieved from his agreement. Equity would have compelled him to execute the formal policy, whenever tendered to him: in voluntarily executing, he has only performed a manifest duty, and cannot now retract the obligation.

The case of Jefferyes v. Legendra (a), cited from Shower's Reports (and reported for the judgment only in Holt, 465), seems inapplicable, as it only proves that a vessel sails with convoy, if she departs with convoy and is accidentally separated by stress of weather. Roderick v. Howil (b) and Warwick v. Slade (c) have no bearing on the present question. The former established that a policy executed without stamp was void, though stamped before the trial. Warwick v. Slade (c) decided that a broker cannot recover premiums paid for insurance after his authority to insure had been revoked by his principal. Here, the stamps were correct, and the authority was never revoked. The defect of stamps was urged as a preliminary objection, but it is answered by the foregoing observation.

Another preliminary objection was founded on the execution of the policy under a power of attorney which did not warrant the execution of such a policy as this. Upon reference, however, to the instrument, we are of opinion that it did authorize the agent to execute a policy granted, like this, upon the usual terms of the association.

The rule must, therefore, be made absolute (d).

The plaintiff further averred, that he, the said plaintiff and the said defendant, on the 15th of February 1829, and thenceforth continually until the 1st of February 1830, were respectively ship-owners and members of the said British Association, and that their names were respectively written under the said writing or schedule, and that they were respectively parties to and bound by the said rules and regulations therein mentioned; that the said policy of insurance with the said memorandum was so made by the plaintiff as aforesaid, for and on the part and behalf of himself; and that the said policy and memorandum was afterwards, viz. on the said 21st of October 1829, subscribed with the names of the said defendant and of divers other persons respectively, by an agent in that behalf duly appointed, as assurers for the sum of 1200*l.* upon the premises in the said policy mentioned; and that the said ship Crisis was, upon the day of beginning the adventure on the said ship in the said policy mentioned, viz. 15th February 1829, accepted by the said committee, according to the said first rule of the said Association; and thereupon, afterwards, viz. on the said 21st of October 1829, in consideration of the premises, and that the said plaintiff, at the request of the said defendant, had paid 5*s.* per cent. on the said sum insured, towards defraying the necessary expenses, and also all other charges due from the plaintiff, according to the said first rule, and had paid to and for the use and benefit of the members of the said association 126*l.* as a premium, &c.; and that the said plaintiff, at the request of the said defendant, had promised the said defendant to perform all things in the said policy of insurance, memorandum, and rules and regulations contained on the part and behalf of the said plaintiff to be performed; the said defendant promised the said plaintiff, that he, the said defendant, would become and be an assurer to the said plaintiff for the part and proportion of the said defendant of the said sum of 1200*l.* upon the premises in the said policy of insurance mentioned, upon the terms mentioned and referred to in the said policy of assurance, memorandum, and rules and regulations, and would perform all things in the said policy of insurance, memorandum, rules, &c. contained on the part and behalf of the said defendant to be performed. The plaintiff in his count further averred, that at the beginning of the adventure, viz. 15th of February 1829, and thence continually until the said 1st of February 1830, the plaintiff was owner of and interested in the said ship to the amount of the monies insured; and he went on to make various statements, shewing his compliance with the rules, and that the adventure was conformable thereto. He then stated, that heretofore, and while the ship ship was covered by the said policy, and within the times prescribed by the said rules, viz. on the 10th of May 1829, the said ship departed and set sail from London, on a voyage towards a place beyond the seas, viz. Archangel, the same not being a port or place excepted in the policy, and the ship not being within any of the exceptions in the said rules mentioned; and that afterwards, and during the continuance of the risk in the said policy of insurance mentioned, and whilst the ship was not within any of the exceptions, &c., viz. on the 5th of June 1829, and on divers days between that day and the 12th of June, &c.; the count then went on to allege an average loss during that time, and another average loss (with the like introductory statements), on the 25th of July following; it also averred notice (August 1st) to the committee of the Association, pursuant to the rules, before the repairs were commenced; election made by them that the repairs should be done; adjustment, (November 18th); the proportion calculated to be due from the defendant, notice to him, and his liability, &c. There was a second count upon the policy, with statements to the same effect, but in some respects more general; and there were the common money counts.

TYRWHITT, in this term, obtained a rule to shew cause why proceedings in the above action should not be stayed till the plaintiff should give security, to be approved of by the Master, for costs. The action was brought on a bond, in the name of the obligee, for the benefit of Elizabeth Whalley, an assignee. The nominal plaintiff was permanently resident abroad; and, upon security being demanded of his attorneys, the assignee, who resided in this country, offered her own written undertaking, in the words following:—" Edward Youde v. Sarah Youde. This action having been brought in the name of the above-named plaintiff for my benefit, I do hereby undertake to pay the said defendant all such costs as she the said defendant may be entitled to recover from the above-named plaintiff. Eliz. Whalley."

In an action brought upon a bond, in the name of an obligee resident abroad, for the benefit of an assignee in this country, the defendant may claim security for costs from the nominal plaintiff: the assignee's written undertaking is not sufficient.

Bayley now shewed cause, and contended that the security was sufficient.

Tyrwhitt, contra. It is true that, if the assignee had been suing in her own name, the defendant could not have applied for security; but she sues in the name of a person who is permanently resident in a foreign country, and the defendant is therefore entitled to the usual security in such cases. In the absence of such security, the nominal plaintiff abroad would be the person against whom the defendant would have to proceed for costs. The undertaking offered by the assignee could only be enforced (if at all) by a special action of assumpsit. If security is ordered as prayed, the assignee may be one of the sureties.

Archbold now shewed cause. Before the new rules, *Hil. 4. W. 4. The new rules not only do not prevent, but compel its being specially pleaded. In Frankum v. The Earl of Falmouth (c) it was held that a defendant could not, under a plea of the general issue, deny that the act was wrongfully done. [Patteson J. There the attempt was, under the word "wrongfully," in an action on the case for diverting water, to bring into question the plaintiff's right of possession.] The examples given under the head Pleadings in Particular Actions, IV. Here the plea of not guilty, if it had the operation contended for on the other side, would put in issue not merely the preferring of the indictment, and wrongfully, but the preferring it without reasonable and probable cause. This would be contrary to the intention of the new rules, which is, that the plaintiff should be always apprised of the defence intended to be set up.

E. V. Williams, contra, was stopped by the Court.

LORD DENMAN C. J. I am of opinion that it was unnecessary for the defendant to plead in denial of the want of probable cause. The injury complained of in this action is, not merely in the indicting, nor in the indictment being wrongful, but in maliciously indicting, and in doing so without reasonable or probable cause. The plea of not guilty is sufficient.

LITLEDALE J. concurred.

PATTESON J. Some cases have been referred to, in which the plaintiff makes an assertion of right, and then complains of an injury done in respect of it; and there it is proper for the defendant to answer by denying the right. But here there is no such assertion of right; the whole matter alleged in the declaration is an act of injury.

A RULE was obtained under the Interpleader Act, 1 & 2 W. 4. c. 58. s. 6., calling upon the plaintiff and Hannah Budd to appear before this Court, and state the nature and particulars of their respective claims to the goods and chattels seized by the sheriff of Dorset under the fieri facias issued in this cause, and maintain or else relinquish the same, and shew cause why the Court should not make such rule or rules touching the same as it should think fit, pursuant to the statute, &c. The defendant's goods had been taken in execution as above mentioned; and the sheriff's officer, while in possession, received a written notice from Mrs. Budd's attorney, stating that the goods belonged exclusively to her, she having purchased them at a public sale on the premises in the preceding year. The notice offered proofs of Mrs. Budd's right, and called upon the officer to relinquish possession. Rogers now appeared on behalf of Hannah Budd, but produced no affidavit. Butt appeared for the sheriff.

A third party called upon by an interpleader rule under stat. 1 & 2 W. 4. c. 58., to appear and state the nature and particulars of his claim to property seized by the sheriff, must make such statement by affidavit. It is not sufficient that he appears by counsel, and that, upon affidavits put in by other parties, it appears that he has given formal notice of his claim to the sheriff.

Tomlinson for the plaintiff. Hannah Budd is not before the Court, not having made out her title by affidavit. By sect. 1. of the act, the Court is empowered to call upon a third party claiming "to appear and state the nature and particulars of his claim;" that must be on oath, in the usual manner. The execution creditor ought not to be driven to try an issue by a mere notice, unsupported by affidavit.

Wightman, in support of the motion. The case now stands as if the defendant had originally moved for the rule. And if this were not so, the clause as to taking out deposits is not introduced for the benefit of plaintiffs, and they are not entitled to raise objections on the subject. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

LORD DENMAN C. J. The case comes before us now as upon an application made by the defendant. Then it falls within the third section of the act, although bail has not been put in, because it has been held that, on a reasonable construction, rendering must be considered equivalent to putting in and perfecting special bail.

PATTESON J. The only doubt I had at first was, whether this could be considered as an application by the defendant; but, it being so, the case is clear. CHITTY against DENDY.Wednesday, May 13th.CHITTY against LUXFORD.

THESE cases came before the Court on writs of false judgment given in the county court of Sussex for the plaintiffs there, now the defendants in error.

In Dendy v. Chitty, the plaintiff (as appeared by the entry of proceedings) declared in debt, for goods sold &c. The defendant pleaded nil debet, concluding to the country, and he then pleaded a set off, beginning, "and for a further plea in this behalf, the said defendant, by leave of the Court here for this purpose first had and obtained, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, says, that," &c., and concluding with a verification. The plaintiff replied as follows: "And the said plaintiff, as to the plea of the defendant whereof he hath put himself upon the country, doth the like;" taking no other notice of either plea. The entry then stated a venire awarded, to make a jury on the plea aforesaid, and to recognize the truth of the premises; and it set forth that the jury afterwards appeared in court, and, being sworn "to speak the truth of the premises above contained and put in issue between the said parties," upon their oath said, that there was due from Chitty to Dendy 30*l.*, beside his costs, &c.; for which sum and costs Dendy had judgment. The entry of the judgment was as follows: "And upon this the said W. D. prays the judgment of the Court hereof

To an action of debt in a court not of record, the defendant pleaded two distinct pleas, one concluding to the country, the other with a verification. The plaintiff replied to the first, and took no notice of the other. The cause was tried, and the plaintiff had a verdict and judgment. Upon writ of false judgment, and upon the premises: and thereupon all and singular the premises aforesaid being seen," &c., "it is considered," &c. The special errors now assigned were, "That the said William Dendy hath not in any manner replied to, answered, or denied, or demurred in law to the said plea of the said Charles Chitty by him secondly above pleaded to the said declaration, whereby the said William Dendy hath confessed the truth of the matters in the said second plea contained, and thereby also the said suit of the said William Dendy was and is 'discontinued:'" and also, "that there is not shewn in the record and proceedings aforesaid, any finding by the jury or judgment of the Court as to the matters in the said second plea contained and set forth."

In Luxford v. Chitty the entry was not materially different, except that the declaration stated the defendant to be indebted to the plaintiff within the jurisdiction of the Court in the sum of 2*l.* 10*s.*, "for the wages of and due and owing to the said plaintiff, within the said jurisdiction, as the servant of the said defendant, and at his like instance and request;" and it was assigned for error (in addition to the grounds alleged in the other case), that the supposed causes of action "are not stated or alleged, nor do the same sufficiently appear in or by the said declaration, to have arisen or happened within the jurisdiction of the county court," &c., "and also for that it is not stated in the said declaration that the said James Luxford was the servant of the said Charles Chitty, or rendered him any services, or was hired, within the jurisdiction," &c. Blackburne for the plaintiff in error. There is on this record a distinct plea, upon which issue might have been tendered, but which the plaintiff has left altogether unnoticed. He was not entitled to treat that plea as a nullity. The statute 4 Ann. c. 16. s. 4., as to pleading several matters, does not apply to the county court. Before that statute, pleading double was matter to be taken advantage of by special demurrer; on general demurrer it was aided; Com. Dig. Pleader (E. 2.), p. 377.: and the same rule must still extend to pleadings not within the statute. [Littledale J. By the new rules of Court, *Hil. 2 W. 4. sect. 34. Chilton, contra. This is not the case of a double plea, properly so called, and to which the old authorities refer, but of two separate and distinct pleas. Before the new rule which has been referred to, if a party filed two pleas without a rule for the purpose, both might be considered a nullity, in the Court of King's Bench, though not in the Common Pleas (b). Here the plaintiff, in an inferior court, only seeks to pass by one of two pleas, which has been improperly pleaded. To the other he has given a complete answer. It may be said that he ought not to have the power of selecting one plea; but his doing so is not so great a hardship on the defendant as if both might be considered a nullity, according to the practice of the superior courts.

Blackburne, in reply. If the defendant's pleading was a nullity, the plaintiff should have signed judgment;

but, instead of doing so, he has answered over, which has always been held to cure duplicity in pleading. It is said that this is the case, not of a double plea, but of two pleas; but that makes no difference. In Com. Dig. Pleader (E. 2.), p. 376, one of the instances given of a double plea is, if the defendant pleads matter of law and also matter in fact; yet it appears that this would be cured by the plaintiff's demurring generally or pleading over. [Littledale J. In Com. Dig. Pleader (E. 2.) p. 377., it is said, "So, if a plea is double, and the plaintiff by his replication answers only to one matter and takes issue upon it, which is found, this aids the duplicity of the plea." And at (F. 4.) it is said, "The replication ought to answer the whole plea, otherwise it is a discontinuance;" and then at (W. 2.), "If there be an issue for part, and a discontinuance for other part, the Court will not give judgment against the plaintiff, till issue tried; for the discontinuance will be aided by a verdict." But the plea or replication is so aided by the statute 32 H. 8. c. 30., which does not apply here. The Court below, if a motion had been made there, would probably have ordered the second plea to be struck out.]

In Chitty v. Luzford, Blackburne mentioned the objection stated in the assignment of errors, that the service in respect of which this action was brought did not sufficiently appear to have been performed within the jurisdiction.

Chilton, contra, contended that the declaration did, substantially, aver this. The objection was not insisted upon.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord

Lord DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court, as follows : —

This was a writ of false judgment given for the plaintiff in the County Court of Sussex. The plaintiff below declared in debt on simple contract. The defendant below pleaded nil debet, and concluded to the country. He also for a further plea, by leave of the Court, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, pleaded a set off. The plaintiff below joined issue on the plea of nil debet, but took no notice of the plea of set off. The venire was awarded on the issue joined only, and the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff, on which judgment was given for him.

It is a rule in pleading that a plea must not be double, but then the plaintiff must demur to the plea if he means to object to it: but, if he does not demur, he ought to reply to the whole plea, and he cannot leave one part unanswered, because it is uncertain what part of the plea the defendant means to rely upon.

And it is also a rule in pleading that if the plaintiff does not answer the whole of the plea it amounts to a discontinuance of the action, on the part of the plaintiff. But then if the action is discontinued, such discontinuance is cured by verdict under the provisions of 32 H. 8. c. 30. This statute, however, only extends to courts of record, and therefore the county court is not affected by it, and consequently a discontinuance in the present case would not be cured by verdict.

The rule which requires the plaintiff to demur to the plea if it be double, appears to apply only to cases where it is pleaded as one plea; but in this case the general issue and set off are not pleaded as one plea; but they are distinctly pleaded as two pleas, and the second plea is pleaded by leave of the Court according to the form of the statute. But the county court, not being a court of record, has no authority in point of law to give leave to plead several pleas, the statute 4 Ann. c. 16. being confined to courts of record; the plaintiff below, therefore, was not bound to take any notice of such a plea; and it cannot be said that it was not known which plea the defendant meant to rely upon, for the defendant pleaded the general issue, and tendered an issue to the country. The plaintiff, therefore, had a right to consider that as a complete plea upon which he might take issue.

A court of error will take judicial notice that the county court had no authority to give leave to plead double: and, as a complete plea had been before pleaded, they will consider the second plea as mere surplusage. We are therefore of opinion that there is no error or false judgment in the court below, and the judgment of that court must be affirmed.

The case of Chitty v. Luxford is the same as Chitty v. Dendy, except that in the case of Luxford there is an objection to the declaration in the court below, that it is not alleged as to part of the cause of action, that it did not arise within the jurisdiction of the county court. But that objection was given up on the argument, and therefore there must be the same judgment of affirmance as in Chitty v. Dendy.

Judgments affirmed.

GARRITT against SHARP.Wednesday,
May 13th.

CASE. The declaration stated, that the plaintiff, before and at the time, &c., was lawfully possessed of a certain building or malthouse with the appurtenances, situate, &c., in which, during all the time aforesaid, there were, and still of right ought to be, divers to wit, &c., ancient openings or lights through which the light and air during, &c., ought to have come and entered, and still of right ought, &c., into the said building or malthouse, for the convenient use, occupation, and enjoyment thereof; and that the defendant, contriving, &c., wrongfully and injuriously erected and kept and continued a wooden fence near the said openings or lights, whereby the said building or malthouse was darkened, and the light and air prevented from coming into the same through the said openings or lights in so ample and beneficial a manner, &c., and the building was rendered unfit for carrying on therein the business of making malt, &c. Plea, that in the said building or malthouse, during all or any part of the said time, &c., there were not, nor of right ought to be, any ancient openings or lights as above alleged, and that the said fence was not nor is wrongfully and injuriously erected, &c., near to the said openings or lights in manner, &c. Issue tendered and joined.

thought that the defendant had left the plaintiff less light than he enjoyed before the present windows were made, to give damages for such diminution:

Held, on motion for a new trial, that evidence of the above description was receivable, and that it might have appeared from such evidence that the plaintiff had altogether lost his right to the easement in question.

Plaintiff had a barn, in the side of which, adjoining defendant's premises, were apertures, by which, chiefly, the barn was lighted. Plaintiff converted the barn into a malt-house, and cut windows where the apertures had been in the barn. Defendant erected (on his own ground) a fence before the windows, which obstructed the access of light. In an action on the case for such obstruction, evidence was offered at the trial to shew that the mode of enjoying the light had been essentially altered by the plaintiff himself, in a manner prejudicial to the defendant. The Judge did not receive the evidence, but directed the jury, if they

Summer assizes, 1834, it appeared that, before the bringing of this action, and for a period of more than twenty years, the building in question had been a barn, in the side of which, abutting on the defendant's premises, were a number of apertures from one to two inches wide. Enough of light and air entered through the apertures for the purposes of those who used the building as a barn. There was no other light, except through the doors. The plaintiff's case was, that the openings had been made on purpose; the defendant endeavoured to shew that they had been caused by decay and wear, or by shrinking of the boards. In 1833 the plaintiff turned the barn into a malthouse, stopped some of the crevices, and converted others, by cutting, into windows, to which he put lattices. The defendant afterwards erected the fence complained of in the declaration, which faced the whole of the apertures, and prevented the access, not only of any additional light which might have been obtained by the recent alteration, but also, as the plaintiff alleged, of that quantity of light which came into the building in its original state. The defendant (as was stated on the motion for a new trial) offered evidence to shew that the alteration in the mode of admitting light to the plaintiff's building was injurious to the defendant's adjoining property: such evidence, however, was not received. The Lord Chief Justice left it to the jury to say whether the apertures were originally placed there on purpose to admit light, and whether the defendant had obstructed any portion of the light admitted; and, in case of their finding in the affirmative on these questions, he directed them, if the light now fell short of the quantity before enjoyed by the plaintiff for the use of his barn, to give damages for such diminution. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 27*l*. In the ensuing term Thesiger moved for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be had, first, on the ground of misdirection, on which point he contended that the proof given respecting the apertures in the barn did not entitle the plaintiff to any enjoyment of windows which admitted light more extensively and in an entirely different manner; and that no licence for such an enjoyment could be presumed from the licence, if proved, to have crevices in the wall of a barn; and he referred to Martin v. Goble (a), and 1 Com. Dig. Action on the Case for a Nuisance, C. (p. 294.) where it is said, "So, an action upon the case does not lie, if the defendant prevents an excess in the plaintiff in using his right: as, if A. had lights in an ancient house, and he rebuilds his house, and makes lights in other places, and larger, to the inconvenience of the plaintiff." And he stated, secondly, that the defendant had offered evidence as to the injurious nature of the new openings, which had been rejected. A rule nisi was granted, against which, in this term (b), Platt and *S. B. Wilson (a). [Lord Denman C. J. In Martin v. Goble (b) the holding was, that the plaintiff was entitled to the same quantity of light in the new state of things as was necessary in the old for the business then carried on.]

Thesiger, contra. The claim of ancient lights could not be supported under the circumstances of this case, even if the former apertures were made on purpose to admit light. The mode of admitting light was completely changed. The plaintiff might as reasonably have claimed to turn the crevices of his barn into cottage windows. [Lord Denman C. J. They might overlook the neighbouring premises; it does not appear that these openings could.] The right to have a particular opening to admit light is established by twenty years' enjoyment; because the attention of the neighbour is called to it, and, if he has acquiesced in the enjoyment for twenty years, he is presumed to have granted the privilege of having it unobstructed. But, if the manner of introducing the light be totally altered, it cannot again be presumed that there was a grant for a mode of enjoyment entirely different from the first. Where there is a mere enlargement, the amount of excess can be ascertained and reduced; but for an alteration like that of changing crevices into windows there is no such remedy. It is only contended, on the other side, that the plaintiff might make the alteration if it did not prejudice his neighbour. The defendant should have been permitted to shew that it did prejudice him. [Littledale J. The statute 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71. s. 3. enacts, that when the access of light to any building shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for twenty years without interruption, the right thereto shall be deemed indefeasible. Perhaps you will contend that that means the same individual building, or a building of the same kind.] It is not necessary to go so far. This case may be put upon the same grounds as Moore v. Rawson (a), where a party having pulled down a building in which he had an ancient window, and erected something entirely different in its place, was held to have abandoned his right of having such window. [Coleridge J. referred to Cotterell v. Griffiths (b).] The alteration there was merely the removal of a blind from a window, not a total change in the mode of enjoyment, as in this case. [Lord Denman C. J. We will speak to the Lord Chief Justice as to the rejection of evidence. If the defendant offered to prove that the present mode of enjoying the light was more prejudicial to him than the former, and that evidence was rejected, I cannot say that the ruling was not wrong (c).] misdirection and rejection of evidence. The misdirection imputed was that it was left to the jury to consider the case as if the mode of enjoying the light obstructed before the obstruction was not material to be considered, provided the plaintiff were deprived by the defendant's act of the same quantity of light as he had enjoyed before. The evidence said to be rejected was intended to shew that the mode of enjoyment had been essentially altered by the plaintiff himself, to the inconvenience or injury of the defendant.

The learned Chief Justice has reported to us, that the question he left to the jury was, whether the apertures in the wall of the plaintiff's tenement were placed there on purpose to admit light, and whether the defendant had obstructed any portion of the light admitted. He does not recollect any evidence being tendered of alterations made by the plaintiff as above-mentioned; we think it, however, clear that the point was made, and that the jury were not required by the judge to consider whether the plaintiff had essentially varied the manner in which the light was enjoyed. His Lordship farther stated, that he was not satisfied with the verdict, and thought it not justified by the evidence.

Under all these circumstances, we think the defendant entitled to a new trial. It is enough to say that a party may so alter the mode in which he has been permitted to enjoy this kind of easement, as to lose the right altogether; and, in this case, some part even of the plaintiff's proofs made it proper that the opinion of the the jury should be taken on that subject.

DEBT for money paid and laid out, and on an account stated. Plea, nil debet. At the trial before Patteson J., at the sittings in Middlesex after Easter term, 1834, the facts appeared to be as follows. The plaintiff let a house to the defendant under a written agreement by which the defendant undertook to pay 42*l.* a year rent, "free and clear from all land-tax and parochial taxes." The defendant held the premises twelve months and then left them, not paying the land-tax or poor-rates. Upon his refusal to discharge these, the collector of land-tax recovered the arrears of that duty from the succeeding tenant, and the collector of poor-rate distrained for the year's rates upon the plaintiff's receiver of rents, pursuant to a local act for the parish in which the premises were situate, viz., 11 G. 4. c. x., ss. 92, 93. (a). The rates were paid by the receiver on the plaintiff's account, and the plaintiff reimbursed the new tenant for the Tenant, by a written agreement under which he took the premises, engaged to pay taxes which, by statute, were due from the landlord. He made default; and the landlord, having been obliged to pay, sued him for the amount, as money paid to his use: Held that, as the landlord was originally liable for the taxes, and exempted from them only by agreement with the tenant, he should have declared specially on such agreement, and could not recover on the indebitatus assumpsit.

land-tax levied upon him. This action was brought to recover the amount so paid; and it was proved that the defendant, after the commencement of the action, had promised to give the plaintiff a cognovit to settle it, but had not done so. For the defendant it was objected that, if he was liable to the present claim, he was so by virtue of the special agreement, and that the declaration should have been framed upon that. For the plaintiff it was urged that, the contract having been determined, a count for money paid was sustainable, and further, that the promise to give a cognovit was proof of an account stated. The learned Judge was of opinion that there was no proof of an account stated, and that the evidence did not support the count for money paid to the defendant's use, inasmuch as the defendant was never liable for the tax or rate to any person but the plaintiff. He therefore directed a nonsuit, giving leave to move to enter a verdict.

Hutchinson moved accordingly in Trinity term, 1834, and cited (as to the count for money paid) Exall v. Partridge (a), Dawson v. Linton (b), and Brown v. Hodgson (c). He also relied upon the offer of a cognovit as evidence of an account stated. [Taunton J. The offer of a cognovit is matter subsequent to the suing out of the writ.] It shews a pre-existing demand. [Lord Denman C. J. It does not follow that there had been an account stated. Littledale J. To support that allegation, there should have been something of a settlement before the action was brought.] On the

Alexander now shewed cause. The nonsuit was right. Unless by special agreement, the defendant was not liable either for land-tax or poor-rate. The landlord is chargeable with the one, by deduction from his rent, under the land-tax act, 38 G. 3. c. 5. s. 17., and the landlord or receiver of the rents is liable to the other by the local act, 11 G. 4. c. x. ss. 92, 93. To support a count for money paid, it must be shewn that the demand was one to which the defendant was primarily liable. [Patteson J. The defendant's agreement here made him liable as between him and the landlord, but not as to other parties. The plaintiff pays his own debt, which the defendant had agreed to pay, and then alleges that he has made the payment to the defendant's use.] Again, where there is a special contract still subsisting, upon which the action might be brought, a general indebitatus count is not applicable. Cook v. Munstone (a) and Lightfoot v. Creed (b) are authorities on this point, which is also illustrated by Child v. Morley (c). Esall v. Partridge (d) is distinguishable: there the defendants were originally liable for the rent which the plaintiff paid. And Lord Kenyon said, "Some propositions have been stated, on the part of the plaintiff, to which I cannot assent. It has been said, that where one person is benefitted by the payment of money by another, the law raises an assumpsit against the former; but that I deny: if that were so, and I owed a sum of money to a friend, and an enemy chose to pay that debt, the latter might convert himself into my debtor," (creditor) "nolens volens." In Brown v. Hodgson (a) the goods for which the plaintiff paid had actually been received by the defendant, and he was liable to pay for them at the time when the payment was made by the plaintiff. In Dawson v. Linton (b) the landlord was the person ultimately liable, under the drainage act, to the tax which the plaintiff, his tenant, paid. Here the tenant, the defendant, was not liable, except by the special agreement between him and the plaintiff.

Sir W. W. Follett, contrà. It is not necessary to the action for money paid, that the defendant should be primarily liable to the person receiving the payment; it is enough if he was bound to reimburse the plaintiff; and in all the cases the real question has been whether or not the plaintiff was compelled to pay the money; because, if he was so, the defendant, as between himself and the plaintiff, was bound to repay it. The plaintiff here, as landlord, was so compelled, and may therefore recover against the defendant, for money paid to his use. In Williamson v. Henley (c) the plaintiff defended an action for some money which he had delivered over to the defendant Henley at his request, and, being obliged to pay the sum and costs, he was held entitled to recover the amount from Henley, upon a special count alleging Henley's agreement to indemnify; but Tindal C. J. at the same time expressed a strong opinion that he might have recovered on a general count for money paid. [Patteson J. It appears in that case that the action was defended at Henley's request. If a man pays a debt for another at his request, no doubt he may recover the amount as money paid.] The costs of the action never were a debt of Henley's. In Lightfoot v. Creed (a), Gibbs C.J. said, "An action for money paid cannot be maintained, unless there be a request to pay it, either express or implied. This was a special contract by the defendant to transfer stock, for breach of which, the plaintiff might recover unliquidated damages. He does not do that, but affects to liquidate the damages by purchasing the stock, and sues the defendant for the difference, as money paid to his use; but it is paid without authority." Here such authority may be presumed from the facts; and the payment by the plaintiff was not voluntary and officious, but compelled by the defendant's fault. In Child v. Morley (b) Lord Kenyon, when describing the point of view in which the case appeared most favourably to the plaintiff, said, "I considered that his paying the differences under such circumstances was not altogether a voluntary act, but done under the pressure of a situation in which he was involved by the defendant's breach of faith." That case does not bear out the proposition that an action for money paid will not lie unless the defendant was primarily liable. In Exall v. Partridge (c) the plaintiff left his carriage upon premises demised to lessees, two of whom, with the plaintiff's knowledge, had assigned their interest to the third, and the carriage was seized by the landlord for rent due under the lease, whereupon the plaintiff paid the rent to redeem his property, and sued the three lessees for money paid to their use. there said, "As the plaintiff put his goods on the premises, knowing the interests of the defendants, and thereby placed himself in a situation where he was liable to pay this money, without the concurrence of two of the defendants, I thought at the trial that it was money paid to the use of the other defendant only; but on that point I have since doubted; and I rather think that the opinion I gave at the trial was not well founded." And Grose J. said, "The plaintiff could not have relieved himself from the distress without paying the rent: it was not therefore a voluntary, but a compulsory payment. Under these circumstances, the law implies a promise by the three defendants to repay the plaintiff." Dawson v. Linton (a) was a case similar to the present, except that the defendant there was liable, not by agreement, but by a local act of parliament. The real ground of the decision there was, that, as between the parties to that suit, the defendant was the person liable to pay the tax, which the plaintiff had paid under compulsion. So, in Brown v. Hodgson (b), Mansfield C. J. in giving judgment observed that this was "not the case of a man officiously and without reason paying money for another." With respect to the form of the action, as now brought, the law will imply a request on the part of the defendant, where a debt which he was bound to pay is discharged by the plaintiff. [Patteson J. In the present case the landlord, who sues, was the party liable to pay by the statutes, though by agreement he and the tenant changed places: the fallacy in the argument lies in passing over the fact that the tenant was not liable

(a) 4 Taunt. 189.

(c) 6 Bing. 299.

Sir W. W. Follett also referred, after the conclusion of the argument, to 1 Chitty on Pleading, p. 384, 5th ed. (350, 6th ed.), and the authorities there collected, and to Fisher v. Fallows (b); and Coleridge J. mentioned Carter v. Carter (c).

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN, C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.

The plaintiff in this case had demised a house to the defendant, at a certain rent, clear of land-tax and of all parochial taxes, by a written agreement. The defendant quitted the premises at the end of his year, having paid his rent, but leaving the land-tax and rates unpaid. The plaintiff relet the house; the new tenant was obliged to pay the land-tax; and the plaintiff's agent, under a local act of parliament, was distrained upon for the rates, and paid them: both these sums were repaid to the parties by the plaintiff. This action was brought to recover the amount of the land-tax and rates, as money paid to the defendant's use. It was objected, at the trial, that the form of action was misconceived, and that the defendant, though liable on his agreement to pay the whole amount of the rent, including the rates, could not be charged with this money as paid to his use. My brother Patteson, being of this opinion, directed a nonsuit, which we think right.

The only doubt we felt in the course of the argument arose from the cases of Brown v. Hodgson (a) and Dawson v. Linton (b), which seemed nearly to resemble the present. In the former case the plaintiff, a carrier, having by mistake delivered A.'s goods to B., who made them his own, paid A. the price, and was afterwards allowed to recover it from B. as money paid to his use. But this was in fact money paid to his use, for it was in discharge of his debt to A.; and it may be fairly said to have been paid at his instance, because he knew that the plaintiff's mistake, in delivering the goods to him, made the plaintiff liable to pay the price to the true owner. His so receiving the goods may be considered as equivalent to saying, "If you pay him (as you may be compelled to do) for the goods, I will reimburse you." In the case before us, the defendant was not liable to pay the money to any one but the plaintiff, and that was by virtue of the agreement.

In Dawson v. Linton (b) goods of the plaintiff, an outgoing tenant, left by him on his farm, were distrained for a tax made payable by the tenant, but which the local act gave him power to deduct from his rent. The plaintiff paid the tax to redeem his goods, and the Court thought that money paid to the landlord's use, because the landlord was ultimately liable. The defence was, that the money was paid to the use of the tenant for the time being, who was primarily liable. But here the plaintiff's payment relieved the defendant from no liability but what arose from the contract between them. The tax remained due by his default, which would give a remedy on the agreement; but it was paid to one who had no claim upon him, and therefore not to his use.

DOE on the Demise of JOHN ANDREW GALLINI against ARTHUR GALLINI, FRANCIS ALBERT
GALLINI, and MARY GALLINI.

Testator, seised in fee of several estates, devised them to trustees in fee, upon trust to permit his sons and daughters respectively and severally to receive the rents and profits of the respective estates; with a clause for preserving contingent remainders. And from and immediately after the decease of any of his said children, the testator devised the estate limited to him or her for life unto or among his or her child or children living at his or her decease, for their natural lives as tenants in common, but with equal benefit of survivorship among the rest of the said children if more than one, and any one of them should die without leaving issue; the child or children of each son or daughter taking the rents and profits of his or her parent's estate only.

And from and after the decease of all the children of each of his sons and daughters without issue, he gave the estate or estates to them respectively limited, to and among all the issue of such child or children during their lives as tenants in common, and to descend in like manner to the issue of his said sons and daughters respectively, so long as there should be any stock or offspring remaining.

And for default or in failure of issue of any of his said sons and daughters, he devised the estate limited to him or her dying without issue, to the survivors of his sons and daughters, for their respective lives, as tenants in common; and after their respective deaths to the children of the survivors of them during their respective lives as tenants in common, with such benefit of survivorship as aforesaid; and after the decease of all of them, to the issue of such children, in like manner as the testator had devised the original estate of each of the sons and daughters.

Held that, under this devise, a son of the testator did not take an immediate estate tail in the premises devised to him, but an estate for life, with remainder in tail to his children as tenants in common, remainder to himself in tail.

(a) The verdict in Doe v. Alfred Lambert Gallini, which was very nearly the same as in this case, will be found more fully stated in 5 B. & Ad. 621. That case is reported, by mistake, as Doe v. Francis Albert Gallini.

that Sir John Andrew Gallini, being seised in fee of the premises after-mentioned, by his will, dated October 19th, 1799, devised all his lands in Berkshire, two messuages in Hanover Square, and also his estates in France, to certain persons named, and their heirs, in trust to permit his son Francis to receive the rents and profits of the said lands in Berkshire (except certain timber, which was devised to the trustees upon distinct trusts), for and during his natural life, he providing for the maintenance of the testator's wife, Lady Betty Gallini, during her natural life: and in further trust to permit the testator's daughter Jesse to receive the rents and profits of one of the messuages in Hanover Square, and to have the use of the stable, &c., behind the same, for and during her natural life: and upon like trusts as to the other parcels of the devised premises severally, for his daughter Louise and his son John respectively, for and during their respective natural lives. The will then (after a clause for preserving contingent remainders) proceeded as follows:

“ And from and immediately after the decease of any or either of my said children Francis, Jesse, Louise, and John, or in case of such forfeiture ” (as after mentioned), “ I give and devise the estate or estates to him, her, or them respectively limited for life as aforesaid, unto and among all and every his, her, or their child or children lawfully begotten, which shall be living at the time of his, her, or their decease, or born in due time afterwards, for and during their natural lives as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, but nevertheless with an equal benefit of survivorship among the rest of the said children, if more than one, and any one of them shall die without leaving lawful issue, the child or children of each of my said sons and daughters taking the rents and profits of his, her, or their parents' estate or estates only. And from and after the decease of all the children of each of my said sons and daughters without issue, I give and devise the estate or estates to them respectively limited as aforesaid unto and among all and every the lawful issue of such child or children during their lives as tenants in common, and to descend in like manner to the issue of my said sons and daughters respectively, so long as there shall be any stock or offspring remaining. And for default or in failure of issue of any of my said sons and daughters, I give and devise the estate or estates so limited to him, her, or them dying without issue unto the survivors of my said sons and daughters, during their respective natural lives, in equal shares as tenants in common, subject to the forfeiture hereinafter declared; and after their respective deaths I give and devise the same to the children of the survivors of my said sons and daughters during their respective lives, as tenants in common, with such benefit of survivorship as aforesaid: and after the decease of all of them to the issue of such children, in like manner as I have before devised the original estate of each of my said sons and daughters. And for default or in failure of issue of all my said sons and daughters except one, I give and devise all my said freehold estates unto my only surviving son or daughter, to hold to him or her, and his or her heirs and assigns for ever."

A clause was added, forbidding any of the sons and daughters, or their issue, to bargain, sell, assign, release, or convey, or to charge with mortgages, &c. their interests under the will, and declaring the said interests forfeited in such event.

The

The testator died, seised, in 1805. There was issue of the testator, living at the time of his decease, Francis Cecil Gallini, in the said will called Francis Gallini, his eldest son and heir at law, and the said two daughters of the testator, Jesse and Louise. John Gallini died in the testator's lifetime. Francis Cecil Gallini had lawful issue living at the time of the testator's death, viz. the lessor of the plaintiff, the defendants Mary and Arthur, and another daughter.

Francis Cecil Gallini died, in 1815, intestate as to real property. He left issue John Andrew Gallini the lessor of the plaintiff (his eldest son), the defendants Mary, Arthur, and Francis Albert Gallini, and another son, Alfred Lambert Gallini, all of whom are now living and of age. Francis Cecil Gallini died possessed of the Berkshire estates. The lessor of the plaintiff is the heir of the body of Francis Cecil Gallini; and, on coming of age in 1822, he was, by a decree of the Court of Chancery, put into possession of the rents and profits of an undivided fifth part of the said Berkshire estates; and the three defendants, on their coming of age, were, in like manner, respectively put into possession of three other undivided fifth parts of the said estates, which they respectively claimed under the will, and still hold, adversely to the lessor of the plaintiff. The present ejectment was brought to recover the three fifth parts. Another ejectment was brought, under circumstances precisely similar, to recover the remaining fifth part from Alfred Lambert Gallini, and in this also a special verdict was taken.

The case was argued in the Court of King's Bench, upon the special verdicts, by Lynch for the lessor of the plaintiff, and Talfourd Serjt. and Coote for the defendants; and judgment was given for the defendants below in Michaelmas term, 1833 (a). The present case was argued, on writ of error, in the Exchequer chamber, in Hilary vacation, 1835 (b).

Lynch, for the lessor of the plaintiff, contended, as before, that Francis Cecil Gallini, the father of the lessor of the plaintiff, took an immediate estate tail under the will. He argued that the paramount intent of the testator, as evinced by the will, was, that all the lineal descendants of the sons and daughters respectively should take, from generation to generation, without preference, interruption or postponement, the estate not going over till there should be a total failure of issue of the sons and daughters: that the testator also appeared to have intended his descendants to take successively for life only (according to the mode of limitation in Humberston v. Humberston (c)), a purpose which, as tending to a perpetuity, could not be carried into effect; and that the legal and paramount intention, to which the other must yield, was to be effectuated by holding that the testator's sons and daughters took estates tail. On the subordination of the secondary to the principal intent, and the mode of construing a will so as to render the principal intent effectual, he cited, in addition to other cases referred to in his former argument (d), the judgment of

Wright* (g): also the rule there stated by Lord Redesdale (h), "that technical words shall have their legal effect, unless, from subsequent inconsistent words, it is very clear that the testator meant otherwise;" and he observed that, if the paramount intent were not to be considered as governing the whole construction of a will, courts of law would be involved in niceties on this subject, resembling those which have arisen in courts of equity upon the distinction between a legal devise and an executory trust; Papillon v. Voice (i). He urged, that it would be contrary to the testator's intention to hold, that upon the deaths of his sons and daughters the estates should go to such of their children as might survive the parents, and to those children only, in tail; a construction which would exclude, or at least postpone to an indefinite period, the descendants of a child not so surviving. He also observed, that the judgment of the court below left it undecided what estate the surviving children were to take; and that if they took estates for life only, the subsequent limitations of the will, being to the issue of unborn children, would be void. But he contended that, even assuming the words of the will to be such to be taken in their plain and natural sense, except when the context shews clearly that the testator meant to use them in a different sense, and then they are to be taken in that sense. That expressions inconsistent with the sense to be so given to the technical words are to be rejected; but that effect must be given to every word in a will, so far as is practicable and as the rules of law will permit. And he contended that in this case the intention of the testator, without reference to general or particular intent, would be best effectuated, according to these rules, by construing the will in the manner above stated. He further contended that the effect which the defendants here sought to give to the words of the testator were consistent with the decision in Langley v. Baldwin (a), which let in an estate tail in remainder to J. S., by implication from the words, "If J. S. should die without issue male;" the express devise there not being to all J. S.'s sons. And he referred to The Attorney-General v. Sutton (b), and Stanley v. Lennard (c), as similar cases. [Bosanquet J. In none of those is it said that an estate tail in remainder was given. Lynch, in reply, commented on the cases cited, and denied that the doctrine as to general and particular intent could be identified with the rule in Shelley's Case (c), the first being a rule of construction merely, the latter a technical rule of tenure.

Cur. adv. vult.

TINDAL C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.

This case comes before us on a writ of error, brought by the plaintiff below upon a judgment given against him by the Court of King's Bench; the question for our consideration being, whether that Court has put the proper construction upon the will of Sir John Andrew Gallini set out in the special verdict.

The Court of King's Bench has decided that, under this will, Francis Cecil Gallini, the eldest son of the testator, did not take an immediate estate tail in possession, but an estate for life only; but that his children took several estates tail in undivided shares as tenants in common. And as John Andrew Gallini, the lessor of the plaintiff, is the eldest son and heir of Francis Cecil Gallini, and, in the character of heir in tail alone, claims the whole of the property in question, and as the defendants, being two brothers and one sister of the lessor of the plaintiff, claim adversely to him three undivided fifth parts of the property devised, the judgment of the Court of King's Bench must be affirmed, if Francis Cecil Gallini took for life only, and not in tail.

And we are all of opinion that the construction put upon this will by the Court below is the right construction.

We think it unnecessary, upon this occasion, to enter into the discussion, in what cases, and how far, the particular intent in a will must give way to the general intent of the testator appearing upon the same instrument, when the two intents are inconsistent with each other; because we think the construction which has been put by the Court below on this will is the only one which can give effect, if not to the whole of the will, at all events to so much of it as can be legally carried into effect.

The question is, whether the children of the testator took estates tail in the properties severally devised to them, or whether they took for life only with remainder to their children in tail, that is, considering the question with reference to the particular premises for which this ejectment is brought, whether the testator's son Francis Cecil Gallini took for life or in tail?

The testator first gives to his son Francis, that is Francis Cecil Gallini, an express estate for life, in the share of the premises devised to him; with remainder to trustees to support contingent remainders; with remainder unto and amongst all and every his children, which shall be living at the time of his decease, for and during their natural lives, as tenants in common.

If we pause here, every provision in the will points directly against an estate tail in Francis. There is an express estate for life: trustees to support contingent remainders; remainders; remainder to such children only as should be living at his death; and to such children for life only, and to them as tenants in common.

The will then, after providing for the case of a survivorship amongst the grandchildren, proceeds thus: "and from and after the decease of all the children of each of my said sons or daughters without issue, I give and devise the estates to them respectively limited as aforesaid, amongst all and every the lawful issue of such child or children (during their lives) as tenants in common, and to descend in like manner to the issue of my said sons and daughters respectively, so long as there shall be any stock or offspring remaining."

It is very difficult, if not altogether impossible, to put any intelligible construction upon the whole of this clause. It is sufficient, however, to observe, that so far as we have proceeded at present, there is nothing to shew an intention that Francis, the eldest son of the testator, should take a larger estate than the estate for life which had been originally expressly devised to him, or that the estates for life expressly devised to the grandchildren should be in any way defeated by enlarging the eldest son's estate for life into an estate tail. On the contrary, we hold the necessary construction of those words to be that of enlarging the estates for life previously given to the grandchildren, into estates tail.

The clause then follows, upon which the plaintiff mainly relies: — "and for default and in failure of issue of any of my said sons and daughters, I give and devise the estate so limited to him or them dying without issue to the survivors, &c.; and for default and in failure of issue of all my said sons and daughters except one, I give and devise all my freehold estates unto my only surviving ing son or daughter, his or her heirs and assigns for ever."

Under this clause, it is contended by the plaintiff, that the sons and daughters of the testator took immediate estates tail.

The words, undoubtedly, if they had occurred without any intervening devise to the grandchildren, would have been sufficient to have created immediate estates tail. But there has been in the foregoing part of the will, not only an express devise to the grandchildren for life, but also words sufficient to enlarge such estates for life in the grandchildren into estates tail. Admitting, therefore, the argument of the plaintiff's counsel to be just, that if we give to the words "failure of issue," when applied to the grandchildren surviving, the force of enlarging their estates for life into an estate tail, we ought to give the same effect to the same words at the end of the devise, when applied to the children of the testator, and consequently that their estates for life must be similarly enlarged, still the question arises, whether such estate tail in the sons and daughters of the testator is immediate, or whether it is not to be postponed until after the estate tail in the children of such sons and daughters has taken effect?

If we consider the clause of the will last referred to, as giving an immediate estate tail to the children, the previous devise to the grandchildren as tenants in common in tail is defeated. Whereas, if we hold the devise to the children of the testator to be an estate in tail, but to be a devise in remainder only, in that case the limitation for life to the children will take effect, and the devise to the grandchildren as tenants in common in tail, in remainder; and the general remainder over, to the children of the testator in tail, will also take effect, and will effectually secure the descent of the property in the line of the testator's family, as long (to use the testator's own expression in his will) as "there shall be any stock or offspring of the testator remaining."

It is objected against this construction, that if the estate tail is given to the grandchildren as purchasers, and one of them had died in the lifetime of the testator, and had left issue, that issue could not have inherited, but the devise, as to such grandchild, would have altogether failed as a lapsed devise.

It may be admitted, that such would be the consequence. But it is to be observed in reply, that as this supposed event takes place in the lifetime of the testator, it was open to him to make such new disposition of his property as he might think fit on this change in his family taking place; and the argument, therefore, is not entitled to the same weight as where the construction put upon a will is such that a failure in the manifest intention of the testator must necessarily follow by an event which takes place after his death; at which time he can have no controul over, and no means of applying a remedy to, the contingency which has taken place. And, again, it is clear, that even in the case just above supposed, after failure of the issue of all the other grandchildren, the issue of the grandchild so dying in the lifetime of the testator would ultimately take under the estates tail limited to the sons and daughters of the testator, which would then come into operation. It may, indeed, be urged, that a difficulty of a similar nature may take place under the construction adopted by the Court, by the failure of an estate on a contingency which may happen after the death of the testator.

For,

For, suppose the grandchildren are held to take as purchasers in tail, then the devise being limited to such grandchildren as shall be living at the death of their respective parents, if any grandchild should die, living his parent, and leaving issue, such issue would not take. To which difficulty the only answer is, that this is an express contingency created by the testator himself, and he cannot, upon any principle of construction, be held to have been insensible to that which was its natural and necessary consequence; and in this case also, as in the last, the issue of the grandchild so dying might ultimately take under the devise in tail in remainder to the children of the testator.

The two cases of Murthwaite v. Jenkinson (a) and Wollen v. Andrewes (b), which were relied upon by the counsel for the plaintiff in the argument in the Court below, and, again, in the argument before us, have been so well and clearly distinguished from the present, by the judgment given by the Court of King's Bench, that we feel it unnecessary to add any thing upon that point, or, indeed, to give any further observations on the case before us, except that we think the judgment of that Court the right judgment, inasmuch as it proceeds upon the construction of the will which gives the utmost possible effect to all and every the devises contained therein.

We therefore think the judgment of that Court must be affirmed.

ASSUMPSIT. The first count charged that the defendants, to wit on 11th June 1832, put up for sale by public auction certain premises stated and represented

Where a contract in writing, or note, exists, which binds one party to a contract, under the Statute of Frauds, any subsequent note in writing, signed by the other, is sufficient to bind him, provided it either contains in itself the terms of the contract, or refers to any writing which contains them.

The purchaser of lands by auction signed a memorandum of the contract, indorsed on the particulars and conditions of sale, and referring to them. Afterwards he wrote to the vendor, complaining of a defect in the title, referring to the contract expressly, and renouncing it. The vendor wrote and signed several letters, mentioning the property sold, the names of the parties, and some of the conditions of sale, insisting on one of them as curing the defect, and demanding the execution of the contract: Held, that these letters might be connected with the particulars and conditions of sale, so as to constitute a memorandum in writing, binding the vendor under stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 3. s. 4., although neither the original conditions and particulars, nor the memorandum signed by the purchaser, mentioned, or were signed by, the vendor.

On a sale of a leasehold interest of lands, described in the particulars as held for a term of twenty-three years, at a rent of 55*l.*, and as comprising a yard, one of the conditions was, that if any mistake should be made in the description of the property, or any other error whatever should appear in the particulars of the estate, such mistake or error should not annul or vitiate the sale, but a compensation should be made, to be settled by arbitration. The yard was not, in fact, comprehended in the property held for the term at 55*l.*, but was held by the vendor from year to year, at an additional rent. It was essential to the enjoyment of the property leased for the twenty-three years. It did not appear that the vendor knew of the defect. Held, that this defect avoided the sale, and was not a mistake to be compensated for under the above condition; although, after the day named in the conditions for completing the purchase, and before action brought by the vendee, the vendor procured a lease of the yard for the term to the vendee, and offered it to him.

presented by the defendants to "consist of a valuable leasehold public house, or small tavern, known as the Aberdeen Arms," &c., "held for a term of which twenty-three years were unexpired at Lady-day then last past, at the low rent of 55*l.* per annum," &c., and to "comprise on the ground floor a commodious bar," &c., "a small yard and washhouse," &c., subject to certain conditions: namely, amongst others, the highest bidder to be the purchaser; that the auction duty should be paid in equal moieties by vendor and purchaser; and that the purchaser should immediately pay a deposit of 20*l.* per cent., in part payment of the purchase money, into the hands of the auctioneer; also one moiety of the auction duty; and sign an agreement for payment of the residue on or before the 25th of June 1832, at which time the purchase was to be completed: that, within one week from the day of sale, the vendors should, at their own expense, deliver an abstract of the lease to the purchaser; that it should not, however, be required that any other title anterior to the lease should be produced; and that, upon payment of the remainder of the purchase money at the time before mentioned, the lease should be assigned to the purchaser at his expense. The plaintiff

then averred that he became the purchaser of the premises on their exposure to sale, upon the said conditions, for the price of 94*l.* 10*s.*, and paid 18*l.* 18*s.* for the deposit in part of the purchase money, and 2*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* as his moiety of the auction duty: the declaration then stated mutual promises by the parties to perform all things on their several parts as purchasers and vendors respectively to be performed; and that the plaintiff had been always ready to perform, on his part, and to pay the remainder of the purchase money, and complete the purchase; that a week from the day of sale had elapsed; that nevertheless the defendants had not delivered an abstract of the lease; and the plaintiff had expended a large sum in endeavouring to procure the abstract and get the purchase completed, and had lost the benefits of the purchase and the use of the monies paid by him for deposit and duty, and kept for the completion of the purchase. In the second count the agreement was laid as in the first count, and performance by the plaintiff averred: and the breach was laid, that the defendants had not, at the time of making the promise, a valuable leasehold public house, &c. (following the representation as in the first count), nor had the said defendants the premises at the low rent of 55*l.*, but the same were at a much higher and larger rent, to wit 65*l.*, whereby the purchase was disadvantageous and of no use to the plaintiff. The third count laid the breach, that the defendants had not authority to sell the public house and premises, nor were possessed of the term therein, absolutely and without condition, or at the low rent of 55*l.* There was also a count for money lent, money paid, money had and received, and on an account stated. Plea, non assumpsit, and issue thereon.

On the trial before Patteson J., at the Middlesex sittings in Trinity term 1834, it appeared that the defendants, who were in partnership as attorneys, being possessed of certain premises, advertised them for sale by auction on the 11th of June 1832. The particulars of sale described the premises conformably to the representation set out in the first count of the declaration; and, for particulars of the premises, reference was made (among other places) to the office of the defendants. The conditions of sale were on the same sheet as the particulars, and contained the conditions mentioned in the first count of the declaration, besides the following, which was the ninth condition: — That if any mistake should be made in the description of the property, or any other error whatever should appear in the particulars of the estate, such mistake or error should not annul or vitiate the sale, but a compensation or equivalent should be given or taken as the case might require, such compensation or equivalent to be settled by two referees or their umpire: and that the decision of the referees or umpire, as the case might be, should be final. The property was put up to sale on the 11th of June; and the plaintiff was declared the highest bidder and purchaser at 94*l.* 10*s.* He paid the 18*l.* 18*s.* for the deposit to the auctioneer, and he also paid the 2*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* for the moiety of the auction duty. He at the same time signed an agreement indorsed on the particulars and conditions of sale, which agreement was as follows: —

dertake and agree to perform my part of the conditions therein specified; in furtherance of which I have this day paid the sum of 18*l.* 18*s.*, being the amount of the deposit, as also the sum of 2*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, being my moiety of the government duty. As witness my hand this 11th day of June 1832. (Signed) Isaac Dobell (the plaintiff).
Witness, G. M. Sheppard."

DOBELL

The attesting witness was the clerk of the auctioneer (a), but was not so described in the attestation. Neither the defendants, nor the auctioneer, nor any one on behalf of the defendants, signed this agreement; nor was their name mentioned in the agreement, or the conditions, or in the particulars, except that, in the last, the defendants were referred to for particulars as above mentioned. An abstract of the lease was in due time delivered; when it appeared that the small yard mentioned in the particulars was not comprised in the lease, but was held from year to year at an annual rent of 8*l.*, the remainder of the premises being held at the 55*l.*, for the term as described in the particulars. It did not appear that this defect was known at the time of the sale to the defendants, who had but recently become owners of the term. There was, in fact, a yard originally mentioned in the lease: but this yard had been built over; and the yard mentioned in the particulars was an additional one. On the discovery of these facts the plaintiff refused to complete the purchase; and his attorneys wrote to the auctioneer, demanding a return of the money paid for deposit and auction duty. The auctioneer referred them to the defendants, upon which the plaintiff's attorneys sent the following letter to the defendants:—

"Gentlemen, — We are instructed to inform you that Mr. Dobell, in consequence of your not having shewn a good title to the premises offered for sale on the 11th instant, as described in the particulars, declines taking to the property; and we have to request that you will direct Mr. Richards" [the auctioneer] "to return the deposit and duty received by him of Mr. Dobell, and that you will remit to us the expenses incurred in this matter, and make some arrangement for the payment thereof."

On the 2d of July, the defendant Hutchinson sent a letter, signed by him, to the plaintiff's attorneys, in which he mentioned his having stated "the case to counsel relating to our sale to Mr. Dobell;" and added, "having obtained counsel's opinion thereon, I beg to acquaint you, we are advised that the reasonable and just compensation, to which Mr. Dobell is entitled on our securing him a lease of the yard and wash-house adjoining the Aberdeen Arms, is an abatement of one eighth of the purchase money (94*l.* 10*s.*) bid by him for the premises, say 11*l.* 16*s.* If he is willing to accede to this, the business may be completed without further delay; if not, we beg to be understood as now calling on Mr. Dobell to appoint a referee to meet one on our part, and settle the compensation or abatement to which he is entitled. If he declines this, we presume you will accept Chancery process for him at our suit."

On the 11th of July, the defendants sent a letter to the plaintiff's attorney, from which the following is an extract:—

"Messrs.

“ Messrs. Hutchinson and Holdsworth have also to request to be favoured with a decisive answer on the part of Mr. Dobell in the course of this week, or they must presume he refuses to complete his purchase, and proceed accordingly.”

On the 12th of July 1832, one of the plaintiff's attorneys wrote to the Defendants, requesting a copy of a plan of the premises, and adding,

“ On being furnished with such copy, I will take the opinion of counsel on behalf of Mr. Dobell, and in a very few days send you Mr. Dobell's determination, whether he will or not take to the premises on the terms you propose.”

On the 13th of July 1832, the defendants sent a letter signed by them to the plaintiff's attorneys, from which the following is an extract : —

“ The time already occupied by Mr. Dobell to deliberate about the course he will adopt is far beyond reason ; and we shall therefore proceed to such measures as we may be advised on Monday, unless we hear from you on or before that day.”

On the 20th of September 1832, the plaintiff's attorneys sent a letter to the defendants, offering, without prejudice, that the contract should be rescinded on the defendant's returning the money paid for deposit and auction duty.

On September 24th, 1832, the defendants sent the following letter, signed by them, to the plaintiff's attorneys : — thereto, inasmuch as we are advised, we have full power to compel the fulfilment of it, subject to the abatement of about one-seventh of the premium, viz. 13*l.* 10*s.*, in respect of the larger rent, to which the premises appear to be liable, than was stated in the particulars of sale, viz. 63*l.* instead of 55*l.* : whereas, if we were to release your client on the terms proposed of returning his deposit, we find, on calculation, the effect would be, that over and above the 13*l.* 10*s.* reduction in the premium, we should have one quarter's rent and other outgoings in respect of the house, and the charges of a man keeping possession for thirteen weeks at 4*s.* a day. These amount to 18*l.* 4*s.*, which, with 16*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, the quarter's rent, makes together, 34*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* Unless, therefore, Mr. Dobell consents to give up the deposit, we shall forthwith, after shewing our title to the premises contracted to be sold, call on him to nominate a referee to ascertain the amount of the allowance to be made to him in respect of the increased rent; and, in default of his doing so within a reasonable time, we shall, according to the conditions of sale, treat the deposit as forfeited, and proceed to a resale of the premises. On the other hand, if Mr. Dobell consents to give up the deposit, we will release him. Writing without prejudice," &c.

In the mean time, the defendants had been in treaty with the owner of the freehold of the yard in question, and obtained from him a lease of it, for the term for which the lease of the public-house had then to run : and, on the 25th of September, they sent an abstract to the attorneys of the plaintiff, who returned it to them.

On the 27th of September, the defendant Hutchinson

sent a letter, signed by him, to the plaintiff's attorneys, from which the following is an extract:—

“ Hutchinson and Holdsworth,

Dobell.”

“ I apprehend there must be some mistake in your returning the additional abstract of the title which I sent, as it was intended to complete the title to the premises sold to your client. I therefore send it again; and, pursuant to the ninth condition of the sale, I beg to propose, on behalf of Mr. Holdsworth and myself, to refer the question of the abatement, to be made on account of the higher rent to which the premises are subject, to two referees or their umpire. On hearing from you, that you accede to this arrangement, I will furnish you with the name of our referee.”

On the 29th of September, the defendant Hollingsworth wrote to the plaintiff's attorneys a letter signed by himself, from which the following is an extract:—

Dobell.”

“ I have been expecting to be favoured with your reply, whether you accept the notice of our proposal to refer the question of abatement of the premium, on behalf of your client, or whether it must be served personally upon him.”

The plaintiff's attorneys wrote, in answer, that they had not yet had an opportunity of seeing Dobell; but that when they did, they would communicate the result.

On the 2d of October, the defendant Hutchinson wrote to the plaintiff's attorneys as follows:—

“Your note received yesterday evening, without date, leaves us so entirely in uncertainty, not only whether we are likely to come to any terms, but also when it may suit Mr. Dobell to give us an answer, that we are driven to act on our right. Considering, therefore, that a reasonable time has elapsed since we proposed a reference as to the abatements in the premium, and that the neglect on his part amounts to a declining of the reference, we feel that we can only treat the deposit as forfeited, and proceed to a resale, which we shall accordingly do.” (Signed by Hutchinson.)

On the 13th of October, the defendants sent a note, signed by them, to the plaintiff’s attorneys, from which the following is an extract: —

“Having understood that Mr. Dobell has refused to refer the question of abatement to arbitration, or complete his purchase on any terms, Mr. Hutchinson and Mr. Holdsworth have acted on that understanding.”

The present action was shortly afterwards commenced.

It was proved that the possession of the yard was essential to the enjoyment of the premises. The money paid by the plaintiff to the auctioneer had not been handed over to the defendants.

The defendants’ counsel contended that the plaintiff must be nonsuited; first, for want of a written agreement or memorandum to satisfy the fourth section of the Statute of Frauds; secondly, because the ninth condition of sale entitled the defendants to the benefit of a reference as to the compensation to be awarded on account of the yard not being included in the lease, and prevented prevented the defect in this particular from being a breach of the contract. They also contended that the count for money had and received could not be supported in respect of the deposit, which the defendants had never received. The learned Judge refused to nonsuit, but reserved leave to move on all the points; and a verdict was taken for the plaintiff for the amount of the deposit, the moiety of the duty, and the expenses incurred by the plaintiff, subject to the taxation of the plaintiff's attorneys' bill by the Master.

DOBELL
against
HUTCHINSON.

In Trinity term 1834, Kelly obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why a nonsuit should not be entered, or why the damages should not be reduced by deducting the 1*l.* 18*s.* paid to the auctioneer as a deposit in part of the purchase money.

R. V. Richards shewed cause, in Easter term last (May 4th) (a). First: There was a good written memorandum within the Statute of Frauds. The whole of the letters must be taken together. The plaintiff's letter of 20th of June refers to the sale expressly. By the letter of 2d July, the defendants refer to "our sale," mention the premises, the names of both parties, and the amount of the purchase money, and insist on the contract, referring to the ninth condition of sale: and the subsequent letters of the defendants refer to every particular necessary for identifying the contract, and they therefore constitute "a memorandum or note" of the "agreement" upon which the action is brought, in writing, and signed by the party to "be charged therewith," according to the words of stat. 29 C. 2. c. 3. s. 4. The signature of the party need not be on the particular instrument: it is enough if he sign any document from which the contract can be collected. In Jackson v. Lowe (a) it was held that the seventeenth section was satisfied by a letter of the plaintiff, describing the contract, and an answer of the defendants stating that they had "performed their contract," as far as it had gone, and were ready to complete the remainder; the court considering that there was enough to warrant the jury, who had found for the plaintiff, in referring the two letters to the same contract. In Saunderson v. Jackson (b) a letter of the defendant, referring to the order given by the plaintiff, was connected with a bill of parcels given by the defendant to the plaintiff at the time when the order was given. In Allen v. Bennet (c) a seller's agent wrote an order for goods in a book belonging to the buyer, not naming the buyer; and afterwards the seller wrote to his agent mentioning the name of the buyer; and the jury having found a verdict for the buyer (the plaintiff), the Court held that the letter and the order might be connected, so as to satisfy the statute. The present is a much stronger case.

Secondly: The ninth condition applies merely to cases of misdescription, and not to the want of that which is essential to the enjoyment of the whole subject of purchase. If the extent of premises, for instance, were somewhat less than that described in the conditions of sale, that would be a misdescription admitting of a compensation in money; but a failure which affects the essence of the thing contracted for, cannot admit of compensation: it avoids the whole contract. This is always the criterion, in courts of equity, where bills are filed for a specific performance. In Sherwood v. Robins (a) Lord Tenterden held that such a condition applied only where the difference of value between the thing described and the thing sold could be the subject of computation: and this is adopted in 1 Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers (b), p. 43. As for the lease which was afterwards obtained of the yard, that was not procured till after the time at which the contract ought to have been completed, and after the right of action had become vested.

(c) 3 Taunt. 169.

Thirdly: Although the auctioneer has not actually paid the deposit to the defendants, yet the latter, in the correspondence, speak of it as their property, and cannot now, as between themselves and the plaintiff, disclaim the possession of it.

Kelly and C. Cooper, contra. First: There was no agreement or memorandum, or note thereof, in writing, and signed by the parties charged, or any person authorised by them. The cases, as to making good a contract otherwise imperfect by written documents referring to it, are not uniform: but, upon the words of the statute, it is not reasonable that, a definitive contract being once concluded, a subsequent admission of its existence, even though made in writing, should satisfy the statute, if the original contract did not. The letters, at the utmost, merely recognise the previous contract as valid: now that contract is actually in evidence, and appears to be invalid under the statute. In Richards v. Porter (a) it was held that a letter, referring to an invoice, did not, with the invoice, constitute a written memorandum to satisfy the seventeenth section; though it is clear that the invoice, in itself, must have been good under the statute, except as to the want of the signature of the defendant, which the letter was required to supply. In Boydell v. Drummond (b) the defendant signed a book entitled, "Shakspeare subscribers, their signatures;" and the plaintiff wished to connect the book with a printed prospectus; but parol evidence for this purpose was held not admissible, the book containing no express reference to the prospectus. The evidence, by which such a connection must be established, is, in fact, that which the legislature meant to exclude. If, in the present instance, all the documentary evidence were set out in a special case, there would be nothing to connect it with the conditions of sale, except evidence of this objectionable kind. In Goss v. Lord Nugent (c) the Court refused to permit parol evidence to be given of a part waiver, by parol, of written conditions of sale, on the ground that the contract sought to be enforced must be proved by writing only. Here the original contract does not shew the name of the party selling at all, and therefore is invalid: Champion v. Plummer (d), Wheeler v. Collier (e). And thus the subsequent letters refer to a contract not valid in itself. Besides, the first letter from the plaintiff rescinds the contract: and the rest are not sufficient to constitute a contract, if none existed before. And the admission of a contract, not good under the statute, does not preclude the defendant from availing himself of the statute. In an answer to a bill in equity, he might admit a parol contract, yet insist on the statute; 1 Sugden's Vend. and Purch., p. 112, &c. (a). [Lord Denman C. J. He might do so: but here he insists on the validity of the contract.] He insists upon a contract which the plaintiff is not now suing on; if this be taken as an admission, it is an admission only of a contract admitting of compensation under the ninth condition of sale: and the plaintiff must take all together.

Secondly, as to the effect of the ninth condition. The defect must be now admitted to be essential; but the condition provides that mistake or error shall not vitiate the sale. Now mistake and error include what is essential misdescription. [Littledale J. Suppose there had been no cellar.] The house could not then have been used as a public-house. [Patterson J. Then it would come to a question of degree.] The cases wherein this kind of condition has been held inapplicable have been instances of wilful misrepresentation: as in the Duke of Norfolk v. Worthy (b). Besides, the lease of the yard having been procured, the difference is easily reducible to computation; and it is no objection that this has taken place since the sale; Thompson v. Miles (c). It is said that it took place after the time for completing the contract; but the defendants have as much right to avail themselves of it, as the plaintiff has to use the letters which are subsequent to that time.

Thirdly, as to the money in the hands of the auctioneer. That was held by him as agent to both parties. The plaintiff directs him not to pay it over to the defendants, and thus makes him, not the defendants, the debtor. The money does not belong to the vendor till the purchase is completed; Harington v. Hoggart (a).

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court. After stating the nature of the action, his Lordship said: —

Three questions arose: 1st, Whether there was a contract binding upon the defendants within the Statute of Frauds. 2dly, Whether the defect of title was the subject of compensation within the terms of the ninth condition of sale. 3dly, Whether, in case the special contract was not proved, an action for money had and received would lie against these defendants.

As to the first question the facts were, that the plaintiff had signed a written contract on the back of printed conditions of sale, in which conditions the names of the vendors appeared as solicitors only, and not as vendors. Nothing was signed by the vendors or by the auctioneer. An abstract of title was sent, on the face of which it appeared that a yard, which was proved to be an essential part of the premises, was held from year to year only at a separate rent of 8*l.*, in addition to a rent of 55*l.*, at which the conditions described the whole premises to be held for a term of twenty-three years. The plaintiff's attorney wrote and rejected the title, demanding a return of the deposit. The defendants wrote in answer, and several letters passed between the parties, the letters of the defendants insisting that the defect was matter of compensation within the conditions of sale, calling on the plaintiff to perform the contract, speaking of our sale to Mr. Dobell, and mentioning the premises by name and the price contracted for, and threatening to file a bill for a specific performance; they were signed by one of the defendants (they being attorneys) for both. They now contend that there is no contract binding them with in the Statute of Frauds.

The cases on this subject are not at first sight uniform; but, on examination, it will be found that they establish this principle, that, where a contract in writing or note exists which binds one party, any subsequent note in writing, signed by the other, is sufficient to bind him, provided it either contains in itself the terms of the contract, or refers to any writing which contains them. Here the letters of the defendants refer expressly and distinctly to the conditions of sale, and they had in their hands, or the hands of their auctioneer, at that very time, the conditions of sale signed by the plaintiff, to which reference is made, so that no parol evidence of any kind was requisite to shew a contract binding both parties, except evidence of the handwriting of each, which must be adduced in all cases. In the case of Boydell v. Drummond (a) the book signed by the defendant did not refer to any prospectus or contract. In Richards v. Porter (b) the letter of the buyer referring to the invoice sent by the seller expressly repudiated the contract. In Champion v. Plummer (c) a memorandum signed by the seller only was held insuff-sufficient to charge even him, because the buyer's name did not appear on it, or on any other paper to which it referred. In Wheeler v. Collier (a) the same circumstance occurred, namely, that the seller's name did not appear on the conditions of sale signed by the buyer; and Lord Tenterden thought that the seller could not sue: but the case was decided on another point. On the other hand, the cases of Saunderson v. Jackson (b), Allen v. Bennet (c), and Jackson v. Lowe (d), shew clearly that a subsequent letter may be a sufficient note to bind the writer, where the requisites above mentioned are found, even where it is written after a dispute has arisen.

For these reasons we are of opinion that there is a sufficient contract in this case within the Statute of Frauds.

As to the second question, we are of opinion that the yard, being proved to be an essential part of the premises, and being held only from year to year, instead of a term of twenty-three years as stated in the particulars, and at a separate rent, the defect was clearly not matter of compensation.

The third question does not arise, as we are of opinion for the plaintiff on the other two, and the rule must be discharged.

The KING against The Inhabitants of St.
GEORGE, EXETER.

Wednesday,
May 27th.

ON appeal against an order of two justices, whereby Mary Lee was removed from the parish of St. George in the city and county of Exeter to the parish of Crediton in the county of Devon, the sessions quashed the order, subject to the opinion of this Court on the following case : —

The settlement of the pauper depended upon that of John Lee, her deceased husband. He was born in the parish of Crediton of parents legally settled in that parish. When he was about twelve years old, an indenture (bearing date 15th October 1811) was executed by the parish officers of Crediton, for the purpose of binding him an apprentice to William Mugford, who was his uncle, and resided in the parish of St. George, Exeter. At the time of the execution of this indenture his father was at sea, and his mother, having other children living with her in Crediton, was in the receipt of relief from that parish. John Lee himself was not residing with her, but had lived for a twelvemonth or more with his uncle (Mugford) in the parish of St. George. The indenture was executed by the churchwardens and overseers of Crediton, at the pay table of that parish, neither Mugford nor Lee being present, nor the magistrates who signed the allowance of the indenture : and it did not appear at what time, or in what place, they signed it : but it bore the signature of two magistrates of the county of Devon. A counterpart was executed by Mugford at his house in Exeter; but Lee was not present when he executed 'it, and was not a party to it, nor to the original indenture. He continued to reside with Mugford, serving him in his business of a thatcher, till some months after he attained the age of twenty-one.

Under stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 5., and before stat. 56 G. 3. c. 199., parish officers had power to bind apprentice the child of a person settled in, and receiving relief from, the parish, the child being also settled in the parish, though such child, at the time of the binding, resided out of the parish, and was not a party to the indenture ; and though the child at the time of such binding was not a burthen to the parish. And the binding was good under the former statute, though the master was neither an inhabitant nor occupier within the parish, provided he became a party to the indenture.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether this was such a binding of John Lee, as that the residence and service under it would confer a settlement: he having lived out of the parish of Crediton a full year before the indenture was executed.

The case was argued in last term (May 2d) (a).

Barstow and Escott in support of the order of sessions. The binding having taken place before stat. 56 G. 3. c. 139., the case depends upon stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2. By the first section of that act, the overseers are to take order "for setting to work the children of all such whose parents shall not by the said churchwardens and overseers, or the greater part of them, be thought able to keep and maintain their children." The fifth section gives them power, with the assent of justices, "to bind any such children, as aforesaid, to be apprentices, where they shall see convenient." It is objected that the pauper, in this case, was not corporeally in the parish at the time of the binding. That must often happen; and it cannot be necessary that, on all occasions of binding, the child should be sent for to the parish, in order that he may be present. The principle is established by Rex v. St. Nicholas, Nottingham (b), where it was held that an apprentice might be bound, by the parish officers, to a master residing in a different parish.

Crowder and Praed, contra. The officers had no power to bind under these circumstances, nor was the master liable to receive. It is clear that the only children whom the churchwardens and overseers can set to work, under the first section of stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2., are the children whose parents the said churchwardens and overseers consider unable to keep and maintain them. The parish officers here could not judge whether the parents could maintain a child living at a distance, nor could they set such a child to work; but it is also clear that the power to bind under the fifth section extends only to such children, that is, children whom they have power to set to work. Lord Kenyon, in Rex v. St. Nicholas, Nottingham (a), lays great stress on the personal knowledge of the parish officers; and so, in Rex v. Clapp (b), he points out that the generality of the application of the act is limited by the want of power to compel a mere stranger to receive the apprentice. When this statute passed, the law of settlement and removal (as Lord Kenyon points out in Rex v. Clapp (b)) had not been defined as it afterwards was by stat. 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 12.; parish officers had therefore nothing to do with children who were not actually in their parish, for such only could be burthensome to the parish. Even now, relief given out of the parish is a misapplication of the fund, except in those cases where the party relieved is legally removeable to the relieving parish, as in the case of a suspended order, under stat. 35 G. 3. c. 101. s. 2. For the statute 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 12. s. 1. only gave a power of removal to the place of legal settlement; it did not order relief to be given to persons not within the parish, till they were brought within the parish by the removal. The legislature seems to have assumed, in provisions respecting parochial administration, that, in order to belong to a parish, it was necessary to be within it: thus in stat. 7 Jac. 1. c. 3. s. 4. provision is made that, if there be not found fit persons to be bound apprentices "within the said cities, towns, and parishes," (where money is given for apprenticing children) then "the poorest children of any of the parishes next adjoining shall be bound apprentices;" where within the parish, and of the parish, are evidently expressions with the same meaning. The statute of Elizabeth, if interpreted in the sense contended for on the other side, could not be enforced: what power could the officers have to compel a child to come from one part of the realm to another? How could they here have compelled Mugford to give up the child, if they had chosen to bind him elsewhere? [Lord Denman C. J. Might not the binding be good, as against the parish, although the child could not have been compelled to be bound, nor the uncle to give him up?] The compulsory power is clearly the only power spoken of in the fifth section, just as the power to set to work, in the first section, is compulsory. Besides, the officers have no power to bind except where they can compel the master to take. This appears by the explanatory provision in stat. 8 & 9 W. 3. c. 30. s. 5. Now here the master was not within the parish. It is true that Rex v. St. Margaret's in Lincoln (a), and Rex v. St. Nicholas, Nottingham (b), authorise the position that, even where a master is not compellable to receive a parish apprentice, the apprenticeship confers a settlement if the master do in fact assent to receive him: but those cases may deserve reconsideration: they are inconsistent with stat. 8 & 9 W. 3. c. 30. s. 5., which makes the liability to receive commensurate with the power to bind. [Patteson J. By stat. 20 G. 3. c. 36. s. 2., no person is liable to receive an apprentice bound by the officers of an incorporated hundred or district, unless he reside in the parish to which the child belongs.] In Rex v. Clapp (a) it was held that an occupier of lands, not being resident, was compellable to receive a parish apprentice. [Coleridge J. This case was reserved on the express understanding that the only point to be raised should be the absence of the child from the parish (b). Patteson J. And that is the only point presented for our opinion at the end of the case.] Then the question is whether there was any power of binding this child. From Rex v. Coleorton (c) it appears that the power of the officers to bind children who are in the parish, does not depend upon their being settled there: so that a decision in favour of a binding where the child was not resident, would give a concurrent power to the parishes, which can hardly have been the intention of stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 5. But, further, it appears that, though the mother was a pauper, the child was maintained by the uncle. If any of these objections be good, the settlement fails for want of due assent by the child, which can only be by deed; Rex v. Arnesby (a). That case appears to overrule the dictum there cited from 4 Com. Dig. Justices of Peace (B. 55.), that a parent may bind his infant son, by common law, without his assent. And in Rex v. Arnesby (a) the infant had actually served under the indenture: here nothing appears, except that the child remained with Mugford, with whom he was before the indenture was executed: it is not found that he knew of the indenture. The indenture here is not simply voidable, but void; for though, when a party, having power to bind, commits an error in the terms of the binding, the indenture may be good till avoided, yet, where the party professing to bind has no legal power to do so at all, the indenture is void. In Rex v. St. Nicholas in Ipswich (b) a binding for less than seven years was held voidable only, not void, under stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4. s. 41.; and Gray v. Cookson (c) is to the same effect. But in Gye v. Felton (d) it was held that an indenture binding to a person not a housekeeper, and under the age of twenty-four, was void, under the same statute. So in Rex v. Ripon (e) an indenture binding an adult apprentice, but not executed by her, was held void, and incapable of conferring a settlement. So, under stat. 56 G. 3. c. 139. s. 11., an indenture not under the seals, but only under the hands of two justices, was held void, in Rex v. Stoke Damarel (g). In *Rex v. sent of proper parties. And these were cases of actual service. It has been found necessary to pass statutes to give validity to indentures executed by parties not duly empowered; such are stat. 54 G. 3. c. 107., and stat. 1 & 2 G. 4. c. 32. This shews that, independently of such statutory provision, the indentures would be void.

This case turned upon the validity of an indenture of apprenticeship. (His Lordship then recapitulated the facts.) One point was made, which, however, was not intended to be reserved by the sessions, namely, whether, before the stat. 56 G. 3. c. 139., a child could legally be bound by the parish officers to a master not resident in their parish. We have no doubt on this point, which is expressly decided by Rex v. St. Nicholas, Nottingham (a), the authority of which case has never been questioned. But the point intended to be reserved was, whether the parish officers had power under 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 5. to bind out any child not at the time resident in their parish. That section, by the word "such," refers to the first section of the same act; and the first section has these words: "the children of all such whose parents shall not by the said churchwardens and overseers, or the greater part of them, be thought able to keep and maintain their children." The words are not grammatically correct, but their meaning is obvious. At the time of the passing of the statute 43 Eliz. there was no law of settlement, nor could the children of paupers, if at a distance from their parents, be sent home by the parish officers. In that state of the law the provisions of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 5. could not apply to any children not actually resident in the binding parish; but, since the law of settlement has been introduced, all the unemancipated children of a pauper are considered as part of his family; and we think that the parish officers of any parish where the pauper is settled and residing, and unable to maintain his children, may bind out his child with the assent of two justices, and in the proper form, without the formality of having that child, if resident at a distance, brought home to his family. The case of Rex v. Coleorton (a), at first sight, seems to lay down the rule, that the statute of Elizabeth is to be construed without reference to any subsequent statutes; but, on consideration, we do not think that any such rule is there laid down; all that is decided is, that where a child is resident in a parish, and the parents unable to maintain it, the parish officers may bind out the child, though the parents be not settled in the parish, which is quite consistent with their having power to bind out one of a family legally settled, resident in, and chargeable to, their parish, though the individual be at the moment resident elsewhere. As to the consent of the child, it is not requisite in the case of a parish apprenticeship, and no danger need be apprehended that a child should be taken from a friend or relation, against the will of that friend or relation, and against the will of his parents, and bound to a stranger; for the whole matter is under the superintendence of the justices, who cannot be supposed likely to sanction such an arbitrary proceeding.

JOHN HALCOMB, Esquire.

IN Michaelmas term 1831, D. Pollock obtained a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to enter up judgment in this cause upon the certificate of the Speaker of the House of Commons, pursuant to stat. 9 G. 4. c. 22. s. 63. The facts appeared, by the affidavit in answer, to be as follows:—

The defendant, in 1830, was a candidate to represent the town and port of Dover in parliament, but Sir John Rae Reid was declared duly elected. The defendant petitioned against the return; and the House of Commons ordered that the petition should be taken into consideration on the 8th of March 1831, at three in the afternoon; but neither the defendant, nor any person on his behalf, attended the house at that time, or within one hour after the time appointed for calling on the parties to proceed to the appointment of a select committee to try the merits of the petition, according to the statute. The house, however, balloted for and appointed a select committee to try the petition, neither the defendant, nor his counsel or agent, being present, or having an opportunity of striking out eleven names from the list of members to be chosen by ballot;

notice the irregularity of the proceedings on the petition, if brought before them by affidavit, and refuse to enter up judgment.

The appointment of a committee to try the merits of a return to parliament, under stat. 9 G. 4. c. 22. ss. 18, 30., cannot legally take place if the petitioner be not present in person, or by his counsel or agent.

If such committee nevertheless be formed, and proceed to declare the petition frivolous and vexatious, the costs of opposing the petition cannot legally be taxed under sect. 60.

And, if the Speaker under such circumstances directs a taxation, and makes his certificate according to sect. 60., this Court, if applied to to put the certificate in force pursuant to sect. 63., will

nor did the defendant know by whom the eleven names were struck out on his behalf. On the 9th the committee met to try the merits of the petition, the defendant not attending to support it, either in person, or by his counsel or agent; and it was decided that Sir J. R. Reid was duly elected; that the petition was frivolous and vexatious; and that the opposition to it was not frivolous or vexatious. The costs of the plaintiff, as returning officer, in opposing the petition, were taxed, and the Speaker made his certificate pursuant to the statute. The certificate (which was filed with the affidavits in support of the motion) was as follows: —

“Whereas William Ley, Esquire, second clerk assistant of the House of Commons, and Francis Cross, Esquire, one of the Masters of the High Court of Chancery, who were duly authorized and directed by and according to the act passed in the ninth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George IV., intituled, ‘An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the trial of controverted Elections or Returns of Members to serve in Parliament,’ to examine and tax the costs and expenses of Henry Pringle Bruyeres Esquire, returning officer at the last election of barons to serve in Parliament for the town and port of Dover, incurred by him in opposing the petition of John Halcomb, Esquire, complaining of an undue election and return of Sir John Rae Reid, Baronet, have reported to me the amount thereof: Now I do hereby certify, that the said costs and expenses allowed in the said report amount to the sum of 341*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*, and that the said John Halcomb is liable to the payment of the said costs and expenses. Given under my hand the 22d day of April 1831.

Soon

Soon after the determination of the committee the parliament was dissolved. During the next session of parliament the defendant had prepared a petition to the house against the decision and certificate, but the presenting of it was, for various reasons, deferred till the close of the session; and the Speaker had expressed his opinion to the Defendant, that the present parliament could not rescind the decision of a committee in the preceding one, and the Speaker's certificate founded on it.

The present action was brought by the returning officer to recover the costs due to him, payment of which had been duly demanded, and refused.

Sir W. W. Follett shewed cause in last Easter term (a). This is a motion to enter up judgment under stat. 9 G. 4. c. 22. s. 63. (b). The Court will not interfere unless

(a) May 11th. Before Lord Denman C. J., Littledale, Patteson, and Coleridge Js. This case had been argued in Hil. T. 1832 (Jan. 30th), before Lord Tenterden C. J., Littledale, and Taunton Js., but no judgment had been given; and, there being now only one Judge on the Bench who had heard the case discussed, the Court directed it to be re-argued.

(b) Stat. 9 G. 4. c. 22. ss. 57, 58, 59., gives costs to the successful party in the respective cases where the petition against a return, or the opposition to such petition, is reported to be frivolous and vexatious. Sect. 57. is as follows:—"And be it enacted, that whenever any committee appointed to consider the merits of any petition complaining of an undue election or return, or of the omission to return," &c. "shall report to the House with respect to any such petition (except as is hereinbefore excepted) that the same appeared to them to be frivolous or vexatious, the party or parties, if any, who shall have appeared before the committee in opposition to such petition, shall be entitled to recover from the person or persons, or any of them, who shall have signed such petition, the full costs and expenses which such party or parties shall have incurred in opposing the same, such costs and expenses to be ascertained in the manner hereinafter directed." Sect. 60. enacts that on application to the Speaker, within three months after the determination of the merits of such petition, by the petitioner or other party, for ascertaining the costs of prosecuting or opposing any petition presented under this act, the Speaker shall unless it sees that the provisions of the statute have been complied with. The certificate is wrong both in substance and in form. The substantial objection is, that where no person has appeared to support the petition within the time specified by the act of parliament (a), there is no power to appoint a committee, and, shall direct the same to be taxed by two persons, of whom the clerk or one of the clerks assistant of the House shall be one, and one of other officers mentioned in this clause, shall be the other: "and the persons so authorised and directed to tax such costs, expenses, and fees shall and they are hereby required to examine the same, and to report the amount thereof, together with the name of the party liable to pay the same, to the Speaker of the said House, who shall, upon application made to him, deliver to the party or parties a certificate, signed by himself, expressing the amount of the costs, expenses, and fees allowed in such report, together with the name of the party liable to pay the same;" — "and such certificate so signed by the Speaker shall be conclusive evidence of the amount of such demands, in all cases and for all purposes whatsoever; and the witness, officer, or party claiming under the same shall, upon payment thereof, give a receipt at the foot of such certificate, which shall be a sufficient discharge for the same."

Sect. 63. enacts, "That it shall and may be lawful for the party or parties entitled to such costs and expenses, or for his, her, or their executors or administrators, to demand the whole amount thereof, so certified as above, from any one or more of the persons respectively who are hereinbefore made liable to the payment thereof in the several cases hereinbefore mentioned, and in case of nonpayment thereof to recover the same by action of debt in any of his Majesty's courts of record at Westminster, in which action it shall be sufficient for the plaintiff or plaintiffs to declare that the defendant or defendants is or are indebted to him or them in the sum to which the costs and expenses, ascertained in manner aforesaid, shall amount, by virtue of this act; and the certificate of such amount, so signed as aforesaid by the Speaker, shall have the force and effect of a warrant to confess judgment; and the court in which such action shall be commenced shall, upon motion, and on the production of such certificate, enter up judgment in favour of the plaintiff or plaintiffs named in such certificate, for the sum specified therein to be due from the defendant or defendants in such action, in like manner as if the said defendant or defendants had signed a warrant to confess judgment in the said action to that amount."

(a) Sect. 2. directs that whenever a petition complaining of an undue election or return, &c., shall be presented to the House within the proper time, and, consequently, there can be no regular certificate for costs. It is clear, from the several sections relating to this subject, that the committee cannot be formed unless the petitioner, his counsel or agent, attend. By sect. 18. the parties are required to be present at the bar when the ballot is taken. By sect. 30., as soon as thirty-three members have been chosen by lot, the petitioner and sitting member, their counsel or agents, are to withdraw; and, each party being furnished with a list of the thirty-three, they are alternately to strike off names till the number is reduced to eleven, which eleven time, a day and hour shall be appointed by the House for taking the same into consideration, and notice given by the Speaker to the petitioners and sitting members, &c. By sect. 3., the House may alter the day and hour, giving notice to the parties; "and if within one hour after the time fixed in the manner hereinafter directed for calling in the respective parties, their counsel or agents, for the purpose of proceeding to the appointment of a select committee, the petitioner or petitioners, or some one or more of them who shall have signed any such petition, shall not appear, by himself or themselves, or by his or their counsel or agents, the order for taking such petition into consideration shall thereupon be discharged, and such petition shall not be any further proceeded upon."

Sect. 5. enacts, "That no proceeding shall be had upon any such petition, unless the person or persons subscribing the same, or some one or more of them, shall, within fourteen days after the same shall have been presented to the House, or within such further time as shall be limited by the House, personally enter into a recognizance to our Sovereign Lord the King, according to the form hereunto annexed, in the sum of 1000*l.*, with two sufficient sureties in the sum of 500*l.* each, or four sufficient sureties in the sum of 250*l.* each, for the payment of all costs, expenses, and fees which shall become due to any witness summoned in behalf of the person or persons so subscribing such petition, or to any clerk or officer of the House, upon the trial of such petition, or to any party who shall appear before the House, or any committee of the House, in opposition to such petition, in case such person or persons shall fail to appear before the House at such time or times as shall be fixed by the House for taking such petition into consideration; or in case such petition shall be withdrawn by the permission of the House; or in case such committee shall report to the House, that such petition appears to them to be frivolous or vexatious."

are then to be sworn, and shall be deemed and taken to be a select committee legally appointed to try the merits of the return or election, from the time of their having been sworn. In the present case that proceeding could not be gone through; the petitioner did not attend or withdraw, receive a list, or strike off any names. Sect. 33. also shews that the presence of the parties is contemplated. Sect. 34. prescribes a mode of proceeding where the party opposing the petition does not appear, but not in the absence of the petitioner. By sect. 40., every such select committee (that is, appointed as before required) shall try the merits of the return or election, and report to the House, and a provision is made in case of no person appearing to oppose the petition, but none in case of default by the petitioner. Then, as to costs, sects. 57. and 58. give them to the respective parties in case of the petition or opposition^a being reported frivolous and vexatious; and sect. 59. gives costs to the petitioner where no person appears in opposition, and the election or return, or other proceeding petitioned against, is reported to have been vexatious or corrupt: but there is no corresponding provision in case of the petitioner's non-appearance. For ascertaining the costs, sect. 60. introduces a new regulation. Two officers are appointed to examine the costs, and to report the amount, with the name of the party liable, to the Speaker, who is, upon application made, to give a certificate expressing such amount and name to the parties. His certificate, however, ought to be merely the echo of the report made by the officers; he has no authority of himself to say who shall be liable. The act says that his certificate "shall be conclusive evidence of the amount of such demands, in all cases and for all purposes whatsoever:” but that can only be applied to cases provided for by the act; not, therefore, where the committee has been formed in a manner not contemplated by the statute. In such a case this Court cannot act upon the certificate as upon a warrant to confess judgment, according to sect. 63. And it is to be observed that sect. 60. makes the certificate conclusive as to the amount only, not as to the person liable. The case of a petitioner not appearing is provided for by sect. 3., which directs that if, within one hour after the time fixed for calling in the parties to proceed to the appointment of a select committee, the petitioner shall not appear by himself, his counsel or agent, the order for considering such petition shall be discharged. And the costs of the opposing party up to that time are provided for by sect. 5., which directs that no proceeding shall be had upon such petition, unless the petitioner shall, within the time there mentioned, enter into a recognizance with sureties, for payment of all costs which shall become due to the opposing party, in the case, among others, of his non-appearance at the time fixed for considering the petition.

It will be contended that, although the House may have proceeded in a manner contrary to the act, the Speaker's certificate is conclusive, and that to contest it would be an interference with the privileges of the House. Such an argument cannot be available where this Court is asked to lend its own process for the purpose of making the certificate effectual: the question being, not whether the Court shall oppose the House of Commons in the exercise of their privileges, but whether it shall itself proceed to enforce a demand not sanctioned by law. The act says, that the certificate shall have the effect of a warrant to confess judgment; but it must mean a certificate regularly granted; if a certificate were given when there had been no committee appointed, no ballot, or no petition, it cannot be contended that this Court should overlook the defect. The certificate is open to any objections that might be made to a warrant of attorney. And if the Court were precluded from questioning the certificate, it would be only as to the amount. In Strachey v. Turley (a), upon a special case, this Court took notice that the Speaker's certificate was not conformable to the act 28 G. 3. c. 52., although by that statute, sect. 23., it was declared that the Speaker's certificate of the amount of costs (with an examined copy of the entries in the journals of the resolutions of the select committee) should be "deemed full and sufficient evidence in support of such action." And upon a case stated in a second action (b), on a new certificate by the Speaker of a subsequent parliament, the Court inquired into the validity of that certificate, and held it to be good. The function of the Speaker in granting it, was there considered to be ministerial only. In Magrave v. White (c) the Speaker's authority to certify for costs in a particular case was discussed, and pronounced upon by the Court. In Ex parte Williams (d), where a petition was declared frivolous and vexatious, and the petitioners did not attend to hear the decision, the Speaker certified the recognizances into the Court of Exchequer, under stat. 28 G. 3. c. 52. s. 9.; and that Court considered itself authorized, upon hearing the case, to vacate the recognizances, although the statute declared that the certificate should be conclusive evidence of the default. [Patteson J. It is not stated there that the Speaker certified the recognizances to have been broken].

But, further, it is an objection in form, that the Speaker does not certify that the two officers, appointed under the act, have adjudged as to the liability of any party to costs. Such an adjudication is necessary before the certificate can issue. [Patteson J. The want of it would be a defect in substance. Lord Denman C. J. Must not we presume every thing to have been done that was necessary to authorize the certificate?] It does recite an adjudication upon the amount of costs; the want of such recital as to the party is prima facie proof that no adjudication was made on that head.

D. Pollock, contra. As to the first point, the stat. 9 G. 4. c. 22. s. 63. directs expressly, that on motion, and on the production of such certificate (that is, a certificate of the amount of costs, signed by the Speaker, as before directed), the Court shall enter up judgment for the sum therein specified. Those words do not leave the Court at liberty to enquire into the grounds of the certificate. Where the effect of the certificate has been made a matter of discussion in this Court, the objection has been raised by the instrument itself. In Strachey v. Turley (a) the Speaker had made a certificate of joint costs, which the stat. 28 G. 3. c. 52. did not allow to be done. In Magrave v. White (b) the question discussed was raised by the statement of the certificate, that the witness was summoned for the sitting member; and, on all other points, the certificate was deemed conclusive. In Ex parte Williams (a) it is stated that the recognizances were certified into the Exchequer upon a report, which shewed a specific reason for their being estreated: by stat. 28 G. 3. c. 52, s. 9., recognizances certified into the Exchequer as there directed were to have the same effect as if estreated from a court of law: and the question was, whether the general jurisdiction of the Court to discharge recognizances, under stat. 33 H. 8. c. 39., was taken away by stat. 28 G. 3. c. 52., or 53 G. 3. c. 71. The Court held that it was not, and, upon grounds shewn by affidavit, they vacated the recognizances. But this Court is told by the stat. 9 G. 4. that, in the case there pointed out, it shall enter up judgment as if the defendant had signed a warrant of attorney. [Coleridge J. Then are not we in the same situation as to entering up the judgment, as the Court of Exchequer is with respect to estreating the recognizances?] This Court is directed to enter up the judgment; the words "in like manner" refer only to the mode of doing it. The observations as to the improper appointment of the committee can, at all events, apply only to the subsequent costs; but, by sect. 5. of the act, it is clear that the petitioner is also subject to the costs up to the time of his making default, and it does not appear that the costs taxed in this case were not such. Upon the Speaker's certificate, it is to be taken that the proper costs were taxed. [Patteson J. The taxation of costs under sect. 60. is to take place on application "within three months after the determination of the merits of such petition."] In this case there has been, at all events, a committee in fact appointed, and the petition has been gone into. The costs ought to be given. [Lord Denman C. J. There was no appointment of a committee under the act. Patteson J. No committee ought to have been appointed. And the prior expenses would be covered by the recognizance.] The petition must be taken to have been determined upon the merits, within the meaning of the act; the abandonment of the petition was a giving up of the merits.

As to the second point, sect. 60. requires the Speaker to give a certificate expressing the amount of costs allowed in the report of the taxing officers, "together with the name of the party liable to pay," but, as to the name, it does not require him to make any reference to the report; and the Court will not presume, from the absence of such statement, that the Speaker violated his duty by certifying the name of a party not found liable by the officers.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J., in this term (June 15th), delivered the judgment of the Court as follows. This was an action of debt, founded on the sixty-third section of stat. 9 G. 4. c. 22., "To consolidate and amend the laws relating to the trial of controverted elections or returns of members to serve in parliament." That section enacts, — (His Lordship here read the section.) The Speaker's certificate was produced, finding a certain amount of costs, and that the defendant was liable to pay them to the plaintiff. Some objections were made to the form of it, which we need not consider, as our judgment proceeds upon other grounds, and we assume, for the purpose of this argument, that the certificate was correct in its form within the sixtieth section, which further enacts, that the Speaker's certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the amount of such demands in all cases and for all purposes whatsoever.

The enactment by which the certificate is made available for rendering a party liable to costs, is the fifty-seventh section, providing, that whenever any committee, appointed to consider the merits of any petition complaining of an undue election, shall report to the house that the same petition appeared to them to be frivolous or vexatious, the party opposing such petition shall recover from any who signed it the full costs of opposing it, to be ascertained in manner thereafter directed. For the amount of costs thus ascertained the plaintiff obtained a rule to shew cause why judgment should not be entered up; against which cause was shewn upon affidavits, from which it plainly appeared that the committee itself was not legally formed within the statute. For the third section expressly enacts:—(His Lordship here read the enactment.) Now the affidavits clearly shew that no petitioner did appear either in person or by deputy, within one hour of the time specified, or indeed at any time. The statute, therefore, expressly required that the order should be discharged, and the petition no further proceeded upon.

The same affidavits, however, state that a committee was, in fact, appointed; but it could not be reduced from thirty-three to eleven, as the act requires, in the manner directed by the thirtieth section, for that assumes the presence of some person acting for a petitioner, who is to strike off names alternately with other parties. The committee, however, were sworn, met, appointed a day for trying the merits, and on that day voted the defendant's petition frivolous and vexatious, in his absence, and without the presence of any person authorized by him.

It was objected at the bar that none of the courts in Westminster Hall are at liberty to enquire into the legality of proceedings by the House of Commons, nor can do so consistently with the respect due to the privileges of that body. It is unnecessary to enter upon that general question in the present case, for in this instance, at least, we are bound to institute the enquiry, as our assistance is prayed, to give effect to the Speaker's certificate; and we should be unwarranted in issuing our process to that end, unless we saw that his certificate was founded on a proceeding legal by the act of parliament, and in compliance with those general principles of justice which are binding on all jurisdictions. The certificate by itself possesses no authority to issue process; recourse must be had to the act for that purpose; and obviously that can only be in cases where the act applies. If this were otherwise, the Speaker's certificate that A. owed B. a sum of money, without more, would authorize, nay, compel, the Court to issue execution against B., to seize his goods, and throw him into prison.

But the Speaker's certificate here produced plainly refers to the sixtieth section of the statute, for it recites a report of examiners appointed under its provisions, and by them empowered to tax the costs of prosecuting or opposing any petition presented under the provisions of that act. But these costs become due by the fifty-seventh section, already cited, the words of which, it is true, apply to "any committee appointed to try the merits," but we think they must be confined to committees duly appointed under the act, and possessing the powers it confers. The House of Commons does not, by virtue of this act, lose its power to appoint an unsworn committee to try the merits of an election, by the examination of witnesses not upon oath: many cases may be supposed in which this ought to be done: but, though the decision of such a committee should be that a petition was frivolous and vexatious, it is clear that the liability to pay costs would not ensue, nor, if they should be awarded, could payment be enforced in a court of law.

The thirtieth section has also been supposed to give validity to any committee de facto appointed, and supersede all enquiry into the process actually pursued in appointing it. The words are, "the said eleven members shall be sworn at the table well and truly to try the matter of the petition referred to them, and a true judgment to give according to the evidence, and shall be deemed and taken to be a select committee legally appointed to try and determine the merits of the return or election appointed by the house to be by them taken into consideration, from and after the time of any such select committee having been sworn at the table." And these words may possibly have been introduced with the intention of dispensing with the necessity of proof of the facts which must concur to give a committee jurisdiction, though they are not very well selected for the purpose. But they do not exclude proof that the preliminary facts never took place, nor prevent the consequence that the jurisdiction never was created. The proof in the present instance is, that the committee was appointed in such a state of things that the statute positively required that it should not be appointed; it therefore had no power over the petitioner: their report that his petition was frivolous and vexatious they had no right under the statute to make: the Speaker could not lawfully put the examiners in motion to tax the costs: their report was an unauthorized statement of an immaterial fact, and the Speaker's certificate of its being made could give it no authority.

The party in this case is not without a remedy for his costs under the fifth section, (if he brings himself within the third section), on the recognizances thereby required: but it follows, in our opinion, from the previous examination, that, as the Speaker's certificate, to which the act assigns the effect of a warrant of attorney, must be one founded on the report of a committee appointed in conformity with the act, and, as this committee has not been so appointed, the rule for entering judgment in this case must be discharged.

A policy of assurance on a ship, contained, at the foot of it, a condition (among others) that all ships were to be inspected and approved of by a majority of the committee of the insurers before admission; that all ships should be well found, &c. and otherwise in a seaworthy state, as to the committee or their inspector should from time to time seem proper; that vessels should have a certain specified quantity of rope or chain cable according to their several burthens, "and all chain cables to be properly tested;" ships to be subject to survey by the committee or their inspector at specified times: and, in case of non-compliance with orders to repair, made by the committee or the inspector, the parties neglecting to be uninsured.

An action was brought on the policy, and for money had and received and on an account stated: and money was paid into Court on two counts, one of which was on the policy, averring generally a performance by the plaintiff of all things in the policy contained to be performed on his part, and a compliance with all the conditions, &c. thereby referred to, and thereto subjoined. Held,

1. That the testing of the chain cable was not by itself a condition precedent, but only a direction to the committee.

2. That, if it had been a condition precedent, the non-performance was in the nature of unseaworthiness, and was a question for the jury; and that the payment of money into Court waived any objection as to the non-performance.

The policy declared that certain rules should be deemed a component part of the policy. By one of the rules, the assured was not entitled to be paid, in case of a loss, till a period which was made contingent upon certain events. The evidence shewed that this period had not arrived before the action was brought; but left it uncertain whether the whole payment was to be made at once, or by instalments. Held,

3. That the payment of money into Court admitted that something was due to the plaintiff on the policy at the time of the action brought, and was so far a waiver of the objection that the action was brought too soon. And,

4. That it lay on the defendant to prove that a part of the sum recoverable on the loss could be claimable by the plaintiff, without the whole being due; and that, therefore, in the absence of such proof, the objection was waived as to the whole sum.

IN Trinity term 1834 (May 23d) (a), Cresswell and W. H. Watson shewed cause against a rule obtained in this case by Holt in Michaelmas term 1833, and Sir James Scarlett, Holt, Alexander, and Tomlinson, argued in support of it. The Court having taken time to consider, judgment was delivered in this term, June 16th. The judgment will be found to contain all the material facts, and the points argued and decided upon.

Lord DENMAN C. J. This was an action on a policy of insurance on the plaintiff's ship, which was tried before my brother Bolland at Durham, at the Summer assizes of 1833.

(a) Before Lord Denman C. J., Littledale, Taunton, and Williams Js.

The policy was not a common marine policy; but it was one on which the plaintiff, the defendant, and a great many other persons, were mutual insurers on their respective ships for the period of one year. This policy contained several rules and stipulations which do not exist in the common marine policies. In the body of the policies there is the following clause: — “And we, the subscribers hereunto, do hereby elect, nominate, and appoint, Messrs. John Bell, William Adamson, Thomas Douglas, Thomas Brown the younger, William Ord, George Harrison and John Brown, to be a committee and general referees between and amongst all and every of us the said subscribers, in all and every matter and thing relating to our respective assurances hereby made; and any three of the committee or referees for the time being are hereby authorized to adjust, settle, and determine all controversies and disputes, and all accounts, demands, and transactions whatsoever, by and between all or any of us the said subscribers to this policy, touching and concerning all and every or any of the insurances hereby made, or other matter or thing relating to or concerning the same, or this policy; and the determination or determinations from time to time to be made and signed by any three of the committee or referees for the time being, according to the terms of this policy, and the warranties, rules, terms, and conditions hereto subjoined (which are deemed a component part of this policy) shall be, and is and are hereby agreed and declared to be final and conclusive to the several subscribers hereunto respectively, and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, who are hereby declared to be bound thereby. And it is mutually agreed that, in case any of the said committee mittee or referees shall die, or become incapacitated, or refuse or decline to act, before the expiration of the said twelve calendar months, then and in such case and so often as the same shall happen, it shall be lawful to and for the surviving or continuing committee, by writing under their hands, to choose and appoint any other or others of us to supply the vacancy or vacancies to be occasioned as aforesaid, and, after such said appointment, the person or persons so to be chosen shall be vested with the same powers and authorities in every respect as are hereby given to or vested in the committee or general referees herein above named; and all acts or orders to be made or signed by such of us as shall or may be chosen and appointed in manner aforesaid shall have the same force and effect as if the same had been made by the said committee or general referees herein above named."

At the foot of the policy there was a heading of Exceptions, Warranties, Rules, Terms, Conditions, and Agreements referred to and subjoined; and, amongst them,

1. "All ships to be inspected and approved of by a majority of the committee before admission; and no ship registered at any other port than Sunderland shall be admitted for a larger sum than the interest of the owner resident at the port of Sunderland. All ships hereby insured to be well found and fitted out with all necessary tackle and materials, and otherwise in a seaworthy state, as to the committee or their inspector shall from time to time seem proper. Vessels not exceeding twelve keels in burthen to have one hundred and eighty fathoms of rope cable, or one hundred and sixty fathoms of chain; and, if above that burthen, two hundred fathoms thorns of rope cable, or one hundred and eighty fathoms of chain; and all chain cables to be properly tested, and the windlasses of such ships as shall have chain cables to be properly secured; all ships to be subject to survey by two or more of the committee and the surveyor in the autumn of the present year, and at such other times as the committee shall think proper. And subscribers neglecting to get such repairs done to, and stores and materials for, their respective ships, as shall from time to time be ordered by the committee or their inspector, after notice for that purpose from the secretary, to be uninsured until the same shall be got or done, although subscriber, in the interim, liable to other losses."

25. "A proportion not exceeding 1*l*. 5*s*. per cent. of the total and partial losses (except salvages as herein-after named) shall be called for upon the subscribers liable to the same at every forty days, and for which receipts shall be prepared by the secretary and given to the several sufferers to receive their proportion of the same; and salvages for money paid for getting any ship off a strand, or for assisting any ship in distress, shall be paid ten days after settled by the committee, if the same shall amount to 100*l*. And where two or more averages or losses shall be put together in one receipt, for greater ease in collecting the same of subscribers, and any subscriber having to pay the same shall fail, or of whom payment cannot be obtained, in such case the several sufferers whose averages or losses shall have been so put together, shall pay back to the holder of such receipt their several proportions or sums which shall have been included in any such receipt, provided such receipt shall be returned to the secretary within ten days after the same shall become due; but, if kept longer longer by the holder, he to take the risk of the whole amount of such receipt upon himself. Any subscriber not paying to the secretary, on demand, his proportion of any receipt to be returned as aforesaid, to be uninsured until the same be paid, although he shall, in the interim, be liable to other losses."

The first count of the declaration contains allegations adapted to the particular stipulations of the policy, and, amongst others, that she was provided with such cables as the rules in the policy require; it states a total loss by the perils of the sea; that the plaintiff revoked the power and authority of the committee; and that the proportion of the loss which the defendant was liable to pay amounted to 4*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*

The second count is a more general one (a); it does not contain any allegation that the plaintiff revoked the power and authority of the committee; and it claims a nominal sum of 20*l.*, as the defendant's proportion of the loss which he was liable to pay. The third count was for money had and received, and on an account stated. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and paid 1*l.* 10*s.* into court on the two last counts.

On the 1st April 1833, the plaintiff's ship got on shore and was stranded near Sunderland, and she was got off on the 20th. Notice of abandonment was given before the 20th, and which was declined; and, on the 25th, a second notice of abandonment was given. The committee met to investigate the loss; and, on the 21st

(a) The averment as to the performance of the conditions precedent, in the second count, was merely that the plaintiff had always performed and fulfilled all things in the policy of assurance contained, on his part and behalf to be performed and fulfilled, and had complied with and observed all the exceptions, warranties, rules, terms, conditions, and agreements thereby referred to, and thereto subjoined.

of June, a notice was served on the plaintiff of a meeting of the committee to make their award. The committee met on the 22d. The plaintiff attended, and said he was not then prepared to go into his case, in consequence of the absence of his attorney, who had his papers. The chairman asked him if he wished to have it adjourned; he said yes, and it was adjourned to the 27th: the plaintiff made no objection to it. On the 25th, the plaintiff sent a notice withdrawing from the arbitration. On the 27th the committee met, examined the surveyor, and made their award; and, by that award, they determined that the plaintiff was not entitled to abandon the ship and to recover for a total loss; and they accordingly dissented from such abandonment; and they determined that the damage amounted to a partial loss, and they awarded and determined that the underwriters should forthwith contribute and pay to the plaintiff the sum of 85*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, being the amount of their proportion, as ascertained by the seventeenth rule. The defendant's proportion under the award would be 1*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*, and that sum was more than covered by the money paid into court on the two last counts, which was 1*l.* 10*s.* The jury found that the loss was total, and that the sum which the defendant was liable to pay was 4*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*

On the trial it appeared that, according to the course of proceedings under the twenty-fifth rule, in consequence of prior losses in the club which had been drawn for, the losses which happened on the 1st of April (which was the day the plaintiff's ship was stranded) would be drawn for at the earliest at forty days after the 22d July, and would have become payable to the assured on the 31st of August; and the club would would not have been in funds earlier than that day to pay the present loss.

The defendant, on the trial, submitted that the plaintiff should be nonsuited on two grounds; first, that the chain cable of the ship was not properly tested according to the first rule; and, secondly, that the action was brought too soon under the twenty-fifth rule, as the club would not be in funds to pay the loss till the 31st of August (a); and the learned Judge gave leave to the defendant to move the Court on both these grounds.

On the first of these points, we are of opinion that the chain cable being properly tested is not, taken by itself without more, a condition precedent: it is true that, in that part of the first rule which immediately precedes the testing the chain cable, there is nothing said about the committee or their inspector; but, both at the beginning of the rule, and also in the latter part of the rule, the committee are mentioned; and, on the whole of the rule, we are of opinion that what is said about the chain cable is only a direction to the committee as to what they were to point their attention to. But, suppose it were otherwise, it is in the nature of a want of sea-worthiness; and the opinion of the jury should have been taken upon it: and, independently of that, we think, by payment of money into court, the objection, if it ever existed, is cured; for that admits that the plaintiff is entitled to recover something, which he could not be if the vessel was not seaworthy (b).

(a) The declaration was entitled of the 3d of July 1833.

(b) As to the effect of the admission by payment of money into Court, in superseding dispute as to the performance of a condition precedent, Meager v. Smith (4 B. & Ad. 673.), Lundie v. Robertson (7 East, 231.), and Early v. Bowman (1 B. & Ad. 889.), were cited.

As to the second ground of nonsuit, there is no doubt but the action is brought too soon; and it would be a cause of nonsuit, if it was not for the paying money into court. That admits, to some extent at least, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. It does not appear from the evidence whether, supposing the loss to be total, the whole of the money, which the plaintiff would be entitled to receive, became due on the 31st of August, or whether the sum was divisible, to be paid at different times; if the whole was to be paid at once, as one entire sum in which no distinction could be made between one part and the rest, then, as the payment of money into court admitted part to be due, it would constitute an admission of the whole; but not so, if it was to be paid by instalments. It lay upon the defendant to have this distinctly ascertained, because the admitting of part unexplained would operate as an admission of the whole. We think, therefore, that there is no ground for a nonsuit on either of the points reserved.

The rule was only granted on these two grounds; and therefore we are of opinion that it should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

In re FENTON.

This Court will not, in a summary way, compel an attorney of the Court to pay over money to a party entitled to it, though the attorney has received it from a client to be paid to such party, if the application is not made on behalf of the client.

SIR JOHN CAMPBELL, Attorney-General, moved for a rule to shew cause why an attorney of this court should not pay over to the stamp office a certain sum of money received by him. It appeared by affidavit that the attorney had been employed in the settlement of the estate of a deceased person, by the executor; that he had, in his account with the executor, taken credit for a sum due for legacy duty on the residue of the estate, but that he had not paid this sum over, though he still held money in his hands to the amount. The Attorney-General made the application, as he stated, on behalf of the stamp office, urging that the judges had jurisdiction, in a summary way, over an attorney of their own court, who had received the money in his professional character.

LORD DENMAN C. J. It appears to me that the court ought not to grant this application. It is not made on behalf of the attorney's client.

LITLEDALE J. The motion is quite new in its nature. When such an application is made by a party who has employed the attorney, and has been induced to trust him in consequence of his professional situation, the Court may interfere; but this is a different case.

PERRIN against WEST.Thursday,
May 28th.

SIR JOHN CAMPBELL, Attorney-General, had obtained a rule in Easter term last, to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of the custody of the marshal. The rule was obtained on the affidavit of the defendant, which was entitled in the cause in this Court, and stated that, on the 23d of June 1834, the defendant was arrested at Cheltenham, on a writ or process, which was as follows:—

“Chancellor’s Court of the University of Oxford. The most noble Arthur Duke of Wellington, K.G., Chancellor of the University of Oxford, to the yeomen bedells of the University, our officers, ministers, and servants in this behalf, jointly and severally, and especially to Thomas James our yeoman bedell in the faculty of law, or his lawful deputy executing these presents, and also to the keeper of the Castle gaol in the city of Oxford, greeting. Whereas, on the 1st day of November, in the year of our Lord 1833, Thomas Perrin,

A defendant in actual custody of the sheriff of a county upon process of an inferior court, having removed himself into this Court by habeas corpus cum causa directed and delivered to the sheriff only, and having been thereupon committed to the custody of the marshal, moved to be discharged on affidavit entitled as of the cause in this Court. Held, that the affidavit was rightly entitled, though no step in the cause had been taken in this Court.

The defendant was arrested in Gloucestershire, in an action of debt instituted in the court of the Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and on a warrant, issuing from that court, and reciting that the plaintiff had sworn that the defendant was a member of the university, was suspected of flight, and, as deponent believed, would not appear, but would withdraw himself out of the precincts of the university. Nothing further appeared as to the defendant’s residence, either by the warrant, or other proceedings in the Chancellor’s Court, or by the affidavits and sheriff’s return to the habeas corpus in this Court: Held, that the defendant was entitled to his discharge, for want of proof of residence, and this, independently of the question whether or not the process of the Chancellor’s Court could be executed at the place in question.

After the arrest, the defendant had appeared in the Chancellor’s Court, waived the objection to the jurisdiction, and entered into the merits; upon which a decree was given that he should pay the debt, and remain in custody till he paid it, which was sworn to be conformable (as the deponent believed) to the practice of the Court. After this the habeas corpus issued: Held, that the habeas corpus was not too late; and that the defendant might still insist before this Court on the want of jurisdiction.

of the city of Oxford, stable keeper, came before John David Macbride, D.C.L., assessor, and then and there instituted an action of debt to the value of 110*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* against James Fletcher West, of Brazen Nose College, Master of Arts, and did allege and make oath before him the said assessor, that the said J. F. W. was by him suspected of flight, and that he verily believed, if the said J. F. W. was to be cited to appear in our court there to answer the said Thomas Perrin in his action aforesaid, he would by no means appear, but would rather withdraw himself out of the precincts of the said University; and that he had no other hopes of obtaining payment of the said debt than by arresting the body of the said J. F. W., according to the forms of the registry: the Judge aforesaid did decree according to this petition: by virtue, therefore, of the decree aforesaid, these are to command you, and each and every of you, jointly and severally, that you arrest and take the body of the said J. F. W., and him safely keep in your, any or either of your, custody or custodies, until he shall have paid the said debt, with costs of suit, or shall find good and sufficient security for his appearance on the court day next after the execution of these presents, by stipulation, according to the form of the registry, and the custom and usage of the University: and in case the said J. F. W. shall neither satisfy or pay the said debt, with costs of suit, nor find sufficient security or stipulation to the effect afore mentioned, that then you, or any or either of you, so arresting the said J. F. W. as aforesaid, do convey and deliver over the body of the said defendant into the custody of the keeper of the Castle gaol aforesaid; and you, the keeper of the Castle gaol aforesaid, are hereby authorised and required to take,

take, receive, and in safe custody keep the body of the said J. F. W., so arrested as aforesaid, until he shall be from thence discharged according to law. Given under our hand and the seal of our office, this 23d day of June 1834.—“ This agrees with the decree of the Judge. Philip Bliss, registrar. John David Macbride, assessor. Debt, 110*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*; costs, 3*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*”

The defendant was detained in the county gaol of Oxfordshire till the 23d of November; when he was removed by a writ of habeas corpus cum causâ, directed to the sheriff of Oxfordshire, and was brought before Williams J., who committed him to the custody of the marshal.

The rule obtained as above was enlarged upon affidavits filed by the plaintiff, also entitled in the cause in this Court. By other affidavits, similarly entitled, it appeared that the proceedings were commenced in the Chancellor's Court, on the 1st of November 1833, the defendant being a master of arts of Brazen Nose College, Oxford; and that a warrant to apprehend him was then issued; that the officer not having been able to arrest the defendant, and the warrant having become illegible, a fresh warrant issued on the 23d of June 1834, under which the defendant was arrested; that, at a special court held on the 28th of June 1834, the defendant's proctor waived the objection to the arrest, and entered on the merits of the case; and it was decreed that the debt and costs should be paid, or the defendant remain in custody according to the usage of the court. The affidavits contained allegations as to the extent of the privilege of the Chancellor's Court; and one of them stated that, according to the deponent's belief, when a decree is made that a party, already in custody under process of the court in the suit, shall pay a debt, and shall remain in custody till payment, no fresh writ is required, by the practice of the court, to authorise the detention of the party. No affidavit stated positively whether the defendant was or was not resident at the time of the commencement of the suit; but it was sworn that the debt was contracted by the defendant in Oxford while he was a member of the University. The sheriff of Oxfordshire returned to the writ of habeas corpus, that the defendant "was received into his Majesty's gaol in and for the said county of Oxford, on the 24th of June, in the year of our Lord 1834, and was there detained in the said gaol under my custody by virtue of a certain writ," which was then set forth in the return as above.

Chilton now shewed cause (a). First, the affidavits are improperly entitled as if the cause were in this Court. The defendant, upon a habeas corpus cum causâ, directed to the sheriff of Oxfordshire, issued by a judge of this Court, has been brought before a judge of this Court, and by him committed to the custody of the marshal, and the judge of the Court below has no notice of the proceedings. Such a proceeding does not remove the cause, but only the body. To remove the cause, the writ should have been directed to the judge of the inferior court. Of this there are many precedents given in Tidd's Forms (b). In Com. Dig. Habeas Corpus (A.) it is said, "An habeas corpus is a writ for bringing the body of him, who is imprisoned, before the Court, cum causâ detentionis. And it may be granted, in respect of an unlawful commitment, or in respect of a privilege, which the party claims, to be imprisoned elsewhere." And, again (G 1.), it is said, "such writ goes to every inferior court." In a case in the Year Book, Mich. 9 H. 6. 44., the writ went to the Chancellor of Oxford. [Patteson J. You say, the writ removes the body, but not the cause: what does it signify, as to this argument, how it is directed?] If the direction were to the judges, they could certify the cause, and the state of the proceedings. In Com. Dig. Habeas Corpus (C.) it is said, "By the statute 2 H. 5. 2. (a) none shall be discharged, or bailed upon an habeas corpus cum causâ, &c. if it be returned, that he is in prison on condemnation by judgment against him, but he shall be remanded and kept in safe custody till agreement of the party, or payment of the sum adjudged." Now here the Chancellor, had the writ been directed to him, would have returned the fact of the condemnation, if it were so. Comyns also says, Habeas Corpus (C), that if the writ "be used for avoiding a lawful suit, upon shewing of this at the return, the Court will grant a procedendo." That shews that, in order to remove the cause, the writ should be directed to the Court below, which can shew, by the return, the nature and state of the proceedings. In Fazacharly v. Baldo (b) Holt C. J., speaking of a habeas corpus directed to and returned by the sheriffs of London, said that "the record itself is never removed by a habeas corpus, as it is on a certiorari, but remains below, and the return is only an account or history of their proceedings stated and sent up to the superior court to judge and determine the matter there; therefore if a cause be removed hither by habeas corpus, the plaintiff here must begin de novo, and declare against the defendant as in custod. Mar." Accordingly, in that case, though the return was filed, a procedendo was afterwards awarded. [Lord Denman C. J. Then is it quodammodo in both courts?] The court below cannot go on, because the defendant's person is taken from their jurisdiction. In Bacon's Abridgment, Habeas Corpus (A) (a), it is said, "The habeas corpus ad faciendum et recipiendum issues only in civil cases, and lies where a person is sued and in gaol, in some inferior jurisdiction, and is willing to have the cause determined in some superior court, which hath jurisdiction over the matter, in this case the body is to be removed by habeas corpus, but the proceedings must be removed by certiorari." Again, (C) (b) "if the writ be disallowed by the judge of the inferior court for any of the causes above specified, it must be returned to the court above with the special matter." The causes referred to, are the restrictions upon the removal of the cause, imposed by different statutes; 43 Eliz. c. 5. s. 2.; 21 Jac. 1. c. 23. ss. 2, 3, 4. 6.; 12 G. 1. c. 29. s. 3.; 19 G. 3. c. 70. s. 6. The disallowance or allowance by the judge below cannot take place, nor the special matter be returned by him, unless the writ be directed to him. In Ellis v. Johnson (c) a habeas corpus had been delivered to the mayor and principal officer of an inferior court, and had been accepted and allowed; and, the inferior court afterwards proceeding to trial and judgment, it was held to be error; and the Court said, "if it were not true that it was delivered to the mayor and allowed, it ought to have been denied." This again throws the allowance on the Court itself. [Littledale J. Suppose a habeas corpus were directed to the warden of the Fleet, to bring up a prisoner in his custody in execution, your argument would go to this, that the affidavits could not be entitled of the cause in this Court, till you had declared against him de novo]. The argument does go that length : some step must be taken here. [Littledale J. Suppose after the body were brought up, the defendant were to apply for a supersedeas, on the ground that he had not been declared against in time]. The plaintiff might in that case have the prisoner taken back to the Common Pleas by habeas corpus, and declare against him in the original suit. [Littledale J. How is the defendant to get out of custody?] It does not follow, at any rate, that this Court would interfere upon affidavit entitled in the cause in this Court. Besides, the plaintiff does not lose the opportunity, in such a case, of proceeding in the Court from which the removal takes place. Again, at this stage of the proceeding, the writ cannot remove the cause at all; for the statute 43 Eliz. c. 5. enacts that the judge, &c. of the Court below shall not receive or allow the writ, unless it be delivered before the jury has appeared, and one of them has been sworn. In the Chancellor's court there is no jury; but judgment has been given: the writ, therefore, has been delivered too late. Lawes v. Hutchinson (a) shews that the writ cannot take effect at this stage. Then, as to the sufficiency of the return. It is certainly necessary, to bring the case within the privilege, that the defendant should be, not only a scholar of the University, but resident there at the commencement of the suit. Such residence is indeed not positively sworn to; but oath was made that the defendant was likely to withdraw himself out of the precincts of the University; from which his residence at the time may be inferred. But in fact the defendant, who is disputing the propriety of the proceeding, ought to shew that he was not resident (a). This is not a case of claim of cognizance, which would throw the onus on the University. Now the defendant swears only that he was non-resident at the time of the arrest, not of the commencement of the suit. [Lord Denman C. J. In Smith v. Boucher (b), which was a case on the very statute (c) and custom upon which you must rely here, Lord Hardwicke held that the oath upon which the arrest is grounded ought to state belief that the defendant would withdraw himself, not simply suspicion. That was on an action for false imprisonment; and it shews that complete strictness is required in the justification]. At any rate, that case shews that an affidavit of belief that the defendant will withdraw is sufficient, which is the very form pursued in this case. Again, the question of jurisdiction might have been discussed before the Chancellor; but it was waived, and the case decided against the defendant on the merits. It is now too late to raise the point; Lucking v. Denning (d). (He then proceeded to argue on the question of the privilege (e); but,

(a) This case was partly heard on May 27th.

(b) Ch. xvi. s. 18. (p. 156. ed. 1828.)

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, contra. The objection as to the title of the affidavits is at any rate not to be favoured, especially where liberty is concerned; and here the enlargement of the rule took place on affidavits on the part of the plaintiff entitled in the same way. But the title is correct, and the writ was rightly directed; for the defendant was in the sheriff's custody, and therefore the sheriff was the party to whom the order of this court was to go. In 1 Tidd's Practice, p. 349. (a) it is said, "The writ of habeas corpus cum causa should be directed, to the sheriff, or other officer in whose custody the defendant is detained." The Judge of the court, not having the custody, can have nothing to do with the writ. The practice never is to issue two writs, one to the Judge and the other to the officer having custody; the removal of the cause is incident to the removal of the body. Lawes v. Hutchinson (b) proves only that the bail of a defendant in this court cannot bring a cause in the Palace Court, in which the same party is defendant, back to this Court by habeas corpus, when the latter cause has been previously removed hither, remanded back by procedendo, and interlocutory judgment signed, and a writ of inquiry executed below. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

LORD DENMAN C. J. With respect to the objection taken to the title of the affidavits, it appears to me that, when a party is here by habeas corpus, the cause is here for all purposes. Then, as to the sufficiency of the return. The question is, whether the defendant is rightfully in custody, and the return must shew that he is so. (His Lordship here read the return.) Now it does not appear, either by the return or the affidavits, that the party arrested was resident at the commencement of the suit. It is true that oath is made that he was likely to withdraw. But it is impossible for us to presume that the plaintiff meant by this to swear expressly that the defendant was resident; it is not a distinct allegation of residence at the commencement of the suit. We cannot make the inference suggested, against liberty, or in favour of the privilege. I do not now decide as to the power of arrest without the precincts.

LITLEDALE J. The first objection is, that the affidavits are not entitled properly. I think that, for this purpose, they may be entitled in the cause in this court. During the argument I suggested the case of a prisoner in the custody of the warden of the Fleet being removed hither by habeas corpus, and the plaintiff not proceeding: and I asked, how the defendant, if he wanted his liberty, was to proceed; I think that he might entitle the affidavits in the cause in this court, for the cause is here, though no actual proceedings have taken place in this court, an instance of which is in Sowerby v. Woodroff (a). With respect to the other question, we cannot here decide on the extent of the privilege. It must appear that the defendant was resident in the university, as was decided in Hayes v. Long (b). The party may possibly have been resident, in the present case; but that fact does not appear in the return or the affidavits.

 FERRIN
 against Wren.

PATTERSON J. I am entirely of the same opinion. It is immaterial to whom the habeas corpus is directed, or whether it be directed to both the Judge and the officer having the custody. After the removal, the cause is here for any purpose. If not, I do not know what answer could be given to the question put by my brother Littledale; nor how it is that the marshal is entitled, after the removal, to keep the prisoner at all. As to the other matter, it did not appear that the defendant was resident, and that ought to be shewn. It is said that the objection was waived. If there had been a waiver, and the defendant had submitted to the jurisdiction, and a decree had afterwards been made against him, and he had then been taken, perhaps the question as to the custom might have arisen. But the supposed waiver happens after the arrest: now that arrest is illegal, and it is as if none had taken place. If the plaintiff meant to take advantage of the waiver, he should have charged the defendant in execution. In that case, I think the question of the custom would have arisen.

WILLIAMS J. Mr. Chilton says that the defendant's objection comes too late. But we are bound to see that there is sufficient cause for the arrest. It was properly admitted, that the defendant must be resident at the commencement of the suit; and it does not appear that he was so. Then it is said that this may be collected inferentially; but there are no sufficient grounds for such an inference: and the fact of the defendant being away from the University at the time of the arrest, is, as far as it goes, inconsistent with such an inference.

The KING against JEYES.

The Court will not grant a mandamus to compel the treasurer of a district to pay the expenses of a prosecution for misdemeanor, in obedience to the order of the Court of Assize, under stat.

7 G. 4. c. 64. s. 23.; the proper remedy is to indict the treasurer, if he refuse to pay.

Where a prosecutor is not bound over to prosecute at the assizes, quære, whether the Court of Assize has power to grant his expenses under the above section?

WADDINGTON obtained a rule in last Hilary term, calling upon Theophilus Jeyes Esq., town clerk and town treasurer of Northampton, to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding him to pay to Henry Becke, the attorney of John Grimshaw, the two several sums of 49*l.* 6*s.* and 53*l.* 12*s.*, for loss of time, and expenses of witnesses, in prosecuting an indictment for riot, tried at the then last assizes for the said town, and for the charges and expenses attending the said prosecutions, pursuant to the two several orders of court made at the said assizes for that purpose.

It appeared that John Grimshaw was bound in his own recognizance, on 30th December 1892, before three justices of the town of Northampton, to prosecute Samuel Smith for a misdemeanor at the next general sessions for the said town; that, at those sessions, the recognizance was respited to the Spring sessions 1833; when it was again respited to the Summer sessions 1833, at which sessions it was discharged by consent: and Grimshaw had preferred no indictment against Smith at any general sessions for the town. At the Northampton Spring assizes 1833, Grimshaw indicted Smith and eleven others for a riot (being the misdemeanor before mentioned), and the trial took place at the Northampton Summer assizes 1834, when Smith and seven others were convicted, and the other four acquitted. No person was bound over to prosecute at these assizes, but the witnesses were subpœnaed to appear both at the Summer assizes 1833, and the Spring and Summer assizes 1834. The prosecutor applied to the Judge at the trial (Park J.) for the costs and expenses of witnesses, which his lordship at first refused, not thinking the case within the statute 7 G. 4. c. 64. s. 23. The riot was committed in the borough of Northampton, which does not contribute to the county rate of Northamptonshire, but raises a rate in the nature of a county rate, of which the treasurer of the town has the charge. Jeyes, the treasurer, refused payment, the magistrates of Northampton, to whom he had submitted the demand, not being satisfied as to the Judge's power. "shall be paid out of the rate in the nature of a county rate, or out of any fund applicable to similar purposes, where there is such a rate or fund, by the treasurer or other officer having the collection or disbursement of such rate or fund;" . . . "and the order of Court shall in every such case be directed to such treasurer," &c.

N. R. Clarke

N. R. Clarke and Miller now shewed cause. First, supposing that the judge had power to make the order, this is not a case for a mandamus. In Rex v. Bristow (a) the Court refused to issue a mandamus to the treasurer of a county to pay an allowance granted by the quarter sessions to the keeper of the gaol, and held that the proper remedy was indictment. In Rex v. The Treasurer of the County of Surrey (b) the Court refused a mandamus to pay money allowed to a witness by the Borough Court of Sessions. In Rex v. Johnson (c) the remedy was by indictment. Secondly, the judge had no power here to order payment of the prosecutor's expenses. The stat. 7 G. 4. c. 64. s. 23. gives the power to order expenses where the prosecutor, or any other person, appears on recognizance or subpœna. Here no one appeared on recognizance; and, although the witnesses did appear on subpœna, yet the words must be taken, reddendo singula singulis; the statute therefore applies where the prosecutor appears on recognizance, or the witnesses on subpœna. [Littledale J. Where a case is removed by the prosecutor, by certiorari, the statute has been held not to apply.] That was the decision in Rex v. Richards (d).

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, and Waddington, contra. As to the first objection. A mandamus is the only efficient remedy: an indictment gives no remedy to the prosecutor, but merely punishes the defendant. In a highway indictment, indeed, the sentence of the Court may afford some remedy; but that is not so here. Rex v. Bristow (a) was only a case of disobedience of an order of quarter sessions. But the ruling there is not consistent with later decisions; and Lord Kenyon's reasoning, that because the writ was very beneficial, it should be sparingly applied, seems liable to objection. He says, further, that it would be descending too low to grant a mandamus to inferior officers to obey the order of justices; and that the Court might as well issue such a writ to a constable, or other ministerial officer, to compel him to execute a warrant. But there is no analogy between the breach of duty by such an officer, and the refusal to carry into effect an order made under the special provisions of a statute. It seems there to have been assumed that a liability to indictment was inconsistent with a liability to a mandamus. That doctrine has been exploded. In Rex v. The Commissioners of Dean Inclosure (a), where a party claimed to have a road set out under a private act, Lord Ellenborough said, "that an indictment would not afford that convenient mode of remedy which might be obtained by mandamus." In Rex v. The Severn and Wye Railway Company (b) it was held that a mandamus might issue to compel a company to reinstate a railway, which, by the act incorporating the company, the public were entitled to enjoy, though the Court was pressed with the argument that the proper remedy would be by indictment. In Rex v. The Commissioners of the Navigation of the Rivers Thames and Isis (c) Lord Boston, who claimed to be entitled to compensation from the commissioners, and had, under an act of parliament, obtained an order of the court of quarter sessions for payment of a sum of money to him, applied for a mandamus directing the commissioners to pay it; and it was objected there that the proper remedy was by indictment, which certainly might have been brought; but the Court said that the indictment would not benefit Lord Roston, and made the rule for a mandamus absolute. Mandamus is, in fact, the appropriate mode of enforcing an act of parliament. An indictment does not terminate the question; it may be delayed by certiorari; and the party prosecuting is not entitled to costs from the county; whereas the Court has a discretionary power as to the costs of a mandamus, under stat. 1 W. 4. c. 21. s. 6. That act shews that it is the general policy of the legislature to promote this remedy; and a mandamus here offers the most convenient method of bringing in question the validity of the order. Secondly, the Judge had full power to make the order. One of the alternatives of the statute has been complied with, as the witnesses appeared on subpoena. It is impossible to separate the question as to the prosecutor's costs, from that as to the costs of the witnesses, about which there can be no doubt.

Lord DENMAN C. J. As to one of these orders, there may be, perhaps, some doubt; but none as to the other. The Judge clearly had a power to order the payment of the costs of the witnesses who had been subpoenaed. As to the propriety of a mandamus, the first question is, whether this Court should interfere by that process, in the case of an inferior officer amenable to others. Before the case of Rex v. Bristow (a), an application was made for a mandamus against a treasurer, in Rex v. Shaw (a): that case was, however, ultimately decided upon facts which do not occur here. In Rex v. Bristow (b) Lord Kenyon objected to descending too low, and put, as an instance, the case of a constable. It is true that, in Rex v. The Commissioners of Dean Inclosure (c), Lord Ellenborough observed that an indictment was a less convenient remedy than a mandamus. That may be sometimes true; yet, on the whole, we do not think the present a case for a mandamus. Rex v. The Treasurer of the County of Surrey (d) is precisely in point; and there the Court referred to Rex v. Johnson (e). Rex v. The Treasurer of the County of Surrey (d) was a case upon stat. 58 G. 3. c. 70. s. 4., which is an act using the same language, and imposing the same direct duty, as stat. 7 G. 4. c. 64. ss. 22, 23. The case is therefore, in truth, a decision on the last act. We are not to carry the remedy by mandamus so far as to issue the writ wherever any officer has neglected his duty: this Court ought not to be called upon in every case of that kind. Even if an indictment be an imperfect remedy, it is some remedy: we must suppose that a respectable party, if convicted, will perform the duty; and, if he did not, the Court would take some step which would enforce it. In one respect, an indictment is a more efficacious remedy than a mandamus; for, if a party has neglected his duty from corrupt motives (and partiality would be a corrupt motive), an indictment would not only be an indirect means of obtaining the money, LITLEDALE J. In Rex v. Bristow (a) Lord Kenyon clearly and distinctly lays down the principle, that a mandamus is not to be granted to compel the execution of a duty by an inferior officer. The only difficulty here is, that the act contains a special direction to the officer to pay; and therefore it may be contended that the case is without Lord Kenyon's rule. But Rex v. The Treasurer of the County of Surrey (b) was upon an act precisely corresponding to that in the present case: there the Court refused the mandamus; and so, therefore, must we. I agree in the doctrine of these two cases: the treasurer is merely the servant of the magistrates. As to the case of Rex v. The Commissioners of the Navigation of the Rivers Thames and Isis (c), that falls within a class of cases in which the Court grants a mandamus. The writ there goes to the principal, who pays over in his public capacity: the present case is one of a servant to the magistrates. With respect to the power of the Judge, the expenses of the witnesses who appeared upon subpoena are clearly within the statute. But there is much doubt in my mind as to the expenses of the prosecutor. At present I think that he is not entitled to them. The words of the act are [His Lordship here read the twenty-third section]. It seems likely that the legislature meant to give expenses to the prosecutor, only where he goes before a magistrate, who binds him over. A magistrate, on hearing the complaint, frequently dismisses it: if the prosecutor then goes to the grand jury, I think he ought not to be paid by the treasurer.

PATTESON J. Rex v. Shaw (a) is a very early, if not the earliest, case where a mandamus was applied for against a treasurer; and it was refused, not on the ground of the treasurer being a ministerial officer, but because the foundation of the rule failed, the treasurer having already paid over the money in obedience to authority which he could not resist. But afterwards, in Rex v. Bristow (b), the Court decided against granting the writ, on the broad ground that the party applied against was a ministerial officer. That was followed up by Rex v. The Treasurer of the County of Surrey (c). We know that, where a party is indicted for not making such a payment, he may be fined, and that the prosecutor, by applying to the Crown, gets the fine: that is a quicker and better remedy than a mandamus. In Rex v. The Commissioners of Dean Inclosure (d) there was a work to be done; and in Rex v. The Commissioners of the Navigation of the Rivers Thames and Isis (e) the parties applied against were not servants.

WILLIAMS J. The case of Rex v. Bristow (b) is decisive. It has been argued that a mandamus is the more convenient remedy; but I observe that, in Rex v. The Severn and Wye Railway Company (g), Abbott C. J. said that he had entertained considerable doubts in the course of the discussion, whether the Court ought to grant a mandamus to compel the doing of an act, the omission to do which might be prosecuted by indictment. The object of that application was very different from the object here; and the case did not fall within the rule, laid down in Rex v. Bristow (a), of not granting a mandamus against an officer simply ministerial.

The KING against FRANCIS HUGHES, the Mayor, and JOHN ROGERS, one of the Justices, of the Borough of STAFFORD.

Thursday,
May 28th.

A rule was obtained in a preceding term, calling on the above magistrates to shew cause why a mandamus should not be granted, requiring them to issue a warrant for levying on the goods of John Ward 6*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, being his proportion of rates made under an act, 11 G. 4. c. xlv. (local and personal, public), for paving and lighting the streets of the said borough. The rule was grounded on an affidavit of the collector, stating that the rates had been duly made, and demanded of Ward, but not paid; that the deponent laid an information before Hughes and Rogers, justices of the borough, for the purpose of obtaining a distress warrant against Ward's goods, and proved on oath before them the making of the rates, and a demand upon

By a local act commissioners were empowered to make paving rates, and to hear and relieve parties complaining of such rates. The act also gave an appeal from the commissioners to the sessions. And it provided that, on nonpayment of rates for seven days after personal demand, it should be lawful for certain justices, upon proof on oath of such demand and nonpayment, to issue a distress warrant. Justices, being applied to for such warrant, refused to grant it, but stated that they would do so if a proper information were sworn, and the party summoned before them.

The Court refused a mandamus to compel the justices to issue a warrant without summoning the party.

Supposing that the act authorised the justices to grant a warrant without summons (a), Held, nevertheless, that they acted rightly in not so granting it.

Ward more than seven days before that application; that the justices refused such warrant; and that the act gave no other remedy for recovery of the rates. Mr. Rogers, in opposition to the rule, made affidavit as follows: — “ That the practice in such cases has hitherto been to grant a summons prior to a distress warrant, which, upon a proper information being sworn before them, he and the said Francis Hughes are now willing and ready to do, believing that in so acting they are complying with the provisions of the said act of parliament.”

Whateley now shewed cause. The magistrates are not obliged to grant a distress warrant without having first issued a summons and heard cause shewn. It is true that the act (a), in sect. 119., which authorises the levy

(a) 11 G. 4. c. xlv. (local and personal, public) sect. 109. empowers the commissioners (appointed by sect. 1. for putting the act in execution) to make rates for the purposes of the act; and sect. 119. enacts, that in case any person assessed to any rate to be made as before mentioned, shall refuse or neglect to pay his proportion of any of the said rates to the collector or collectors for seven days next after personal demand, or demand in writing left at his usual or last place of abode, “ it shall be lawful for any justice or justices of the peace of the said borough, upon proof made upon oath of such demand and nonpayment, (which oath any such justice or justices is and are hereby empowered and required to administer,) by warrant under the hand and seal, or hands and seals, of such justice or justices, (which he and they is and are hereby empowered to grant), to authorise and direct the said collector or collectors to levy such rate or monies so in arrear, together with the costs and charges attending the same, to be ascertained by such justice or justices, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person or persons so refusing or neglecting,” &c., “ and in default of such distress it shall and may be lawful to and for such justice or justices to commit such person or persons to the common gaol or house of correction for the said county of Stafford, there to remain without bail or mainprize for any time not exceeding three calendar months, or until payment of such sum or sums of money as shall have been found due and in arrear upon all or any such levy by distress, does not expressly require a summons before issuing a warrant; but it does not take away that mode of proceeding, nor oblige the justices to grant a warrant without it. In Rex v. Benn (a) this Court would not issue a mandamus to justices to grant a distress warrant for a poor rate without summons; and Lord Kenyon said, "A summons must precede a warrant of distress, which is in the nature of an execution. On the summons, the party may shew a sufficient reason to the magistrates why a warrant of distress should not issue; as for instance, that he has already paid the assessment to one assessment or assessments as aforesaid, together with all costs, charges, and expenses, to be ascertained by the said justice or justices."

Sect. 120. enables any person who shall think himself aggrieved by any rate or assessment under the act, to apply to the commissioners (appointed by sect. 1.), at their first or second meeting after the demanding of such rate, and empowers the commissioners to relieve such party if they shall think him aggrieved. It also enables the party, if dissatisfied with their determination, to appeal to the quarter sessions, whose determination shall be final.

By sect. 129. all fines, penalties, and forfeitures (of which there are many, for various offences), imposed by the act, are (where it is not otherwise particularly directed) to be levied and recovered by distress and sale of the offender's goods, by warrant of any justice of the peace for the said borough, &c., (which warrant the justice is thereby required to grant), upon confession, or information on oath, &c.

Sect. 133. enacts, "that in all cases in which by this act any penalty or forfeiture is imposed and made recoverable by information before a justice of the peace, it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace to whom complaint shall be made of any offence against this act, to summon the party complained against before him, and on such summons to hear and determine the matter," &c., "although no information in writing shall have been exhibited or taken by or before such justice," &c.

Sect. 137. enacts, "that when any distress shall be made for any sum or sums of money to be levied by virtue of this act, the distress itself shall not be deemed unlawful, nor the party or parties making the same be deemed a trespasser or trespassers, on account of any defect or want of form in the summons, conviction, warrant of distress, or other proceedings relating thereto."

of the parish officers, who has not accounted for it. But it is an invariable maxim in our law that no man shall be punished before he has had an opportunity of being heard: whereas if a warrant of distress were to be issued without any previous summons, the party would have no opportunity of shewing cause why the execution should not issue against him." Justices have been held liable, by criminal information and indictment, for convicting, or making an order in the nature of a conviction, without having summoned the party: Rex v. Allington (a), Rex v. Constable (b), Rex v. Commins (c). In the present case an action would lie for issuing the warrant; and where that may reasonably be apprehended, the Court will not grant a mandamus: Rex v. The Justices of Buckinghamshire (d), Rex v. Broderip (e). The statute clearly contemplates a summons, because it enacts (sect. 137.) that a distress shall not be deemed unlawful for any defect in the summons.

R. V. Richards, who was to have supported the rule, was absent.

LORD DENMAN C. J. I think the justices have done that which was perfectly right. It may be that the act of parliament was intended to give them more than the ordinary powers in cases of this kind: but, if that is so, they have properly limited those powers by saying, "we will not issue a distress warrant till we have heard the LITTLEDALE J. It may be a question whether the justices might exercise this authority or not; but at all events a mandamus ought not to issue.

PATTERSON J. The only question is, whether the act is obligatory or not. There are no words to make it so. It may have been contemplated that circumstances might arise in which a summons might operate merely as a notice to the party to get out of the way, and it would therefore be desirable that a distress warrant should be issued at once: but the act does not oblige the justices to issue it.

WILLIAMS J. I am of the same opinion; and I think that if the justices might have issued the warrant, they have exercised their discretion very wisely in not doing so.

R. V. Richards, being in Court shortly afterwards, obtained leave to support the rule. The magistrates have only a ministerial duty to perform in enforcing payment of the rate. It cannot have been meant that they should revise and correct the assessment. They state that they are willing to grant a summons: but it would be ineffectual, as they have no power to vary or modify the rate. If it had been intended that cause should be shewn before a distress warrant issued, the act might have directed a summons and hearing before the commissioners (who, by sect. 120., have power to relieve parties aggrieved): but this is not done. In cases

cases where the justices have to convict, and award the penalties, they, being the proper parties to hear and determine, are properly directed to issue the summons; but here, if a summons were required, it clearly ought not to be issued by them. As to sect. 137., which enacts that when any distress shall be made for any sum to be levied by virtue of the act, the distress shall not be deemed unlawful on account of any defect in the summons, that does not necessarily apply to distresses for non-payment of rates, because the act gives powers of distress for levying penalties and forfeitures on convictions; and those convictions take place upon summons. [Patteson J. How does this case differ from that of a distress for a poor-rate? There the justices have nothing to do with making the rate, and no control over it; and the clause, 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 4., empowering them to distrain, makes no mention of a summons. Yet it has been repeatedly held that a summons must issue before the warrant of distress for a poor-rate.] Here a tribunal (that of the commissioners) is expressly constituted for the purpose of hearing any complaint against the assessment. [Patteson J. In the other case the sessions are such a tribunal.] Here the enactments are such that the commissioners and magistrates form, as it were, branches of one court. The magistrates have no discretionary power as to granting a warrant. The act, indeed, would be nugatory if they might take the rate into consideration when called upon to grant a warrant. [Patteson J. The defendant might insist on many things independent of the propriety of the rate; for instance, that it had never been demanded of him.]

Lord

Lord DENMAN C. J. Upon the main point in the case, not the least doubt has been raised. The inference drawn from that clause of the act which declares that a distress shall not be invalidated by a defect in the summons, has been answered by Mr. Richards: convictions may take place on summons, and be enforced by distress; therefore the clause may apply to them. But it appears to me that this statute and the act 43 Eliz. c. 2. stand on precisely the same footing as to the point in question. By that act the overseers are empowered to make rates; an appeal to the sessions is given; if the rate is not appealed against, or is confirmed, two justices, upon non-payment, may issue a distress-warrant. The same provisions are contained in this act, the commissioners here making the rate, as the overseers do under 43 Eliz. c. 2. But, under the act of Elizabeth, it has often been held that a summons must issue before the warrant of distress; not in order that the magistrates may exercise any authority over the rate, but that the party charged may be enabled to shew whether or not he has paid the rate, and to make any defence which may arise upon the simple circumstance of a summons to shew cause why he should not pay the rate. Why should we suppose that the legislature intended any different mode of proceeding under the present act? Nothing can be more unreasonable than the course here proposed; and, unless it were expressly directed by act of parliament, I should think that magistrates ought not to proceed to the arbitrary act of issuing a warrant without calling upon the party to shew whether he had or had not, in fact, paid the rate, or why it had not been paid. In my opinion the magistrates in this case have done themselves honour by refusing

refusing so to proceed. The rule will be discharged, and with costs, almost as a matter of course.

LITLEDALE J. I am of the same opinion. The statute in question is like 43 Eliz. c. 2.; and it is reasonable that there should be a summons before a distress issues.

PATTERSON J. It is not necessary to the construction we are giving the statute, to say that the justices are invested with a power over the rate; nor are they. The whole object of the summons would be, that the party might be heard to shew cause why he should not pay the rate. At all events the act does not compel the justices to issue a warrant without calling the party before them.

WILLIAMS J. My mind remains without a particle of doubt on this subject. The act is, at any rate, not imperative: it only says that "it shall be lawful" for the justices to issue their warrant. The analogy between this case and that of a poor-rate is complete. Suppose it to be true that under this act the commissioners only, and not the justices, are enabled to relieve against the rate: under the statute of Elizabeth, the justices who issue the distress warrant cannot relieve, but the party must appeal to the sessions. According to the argument in support of this application, if there were no appeal, or an unsuccessful one, against a poor-rate, nothing would remain for the justices, upon nonpayment, but to grant their warrant. Rex v. Benn (a), however, is a sufficient authority to shew that the answer here given by the magistrates is a complete one.

[The following case, argued and decided in Trinity term, 1836, may conveniently be introduced here.]

PAINTER against The LIVERPOOL Oil Gas Light Company. Friday,
May 27th.

TROVER for coaches, horses, and harness. Plea, that the plaintiff, after the passing of an act, 4 G. 4. c. xxxix. (local and personal, public), for lighting the town of Liverpool with oil gas, and before the time when, &c. to wit, on, &c. was indebted to the defendants in a large sum, to wit, &c. for gas supplied by contract, and that afterwards, and while the plaintiff was so indebted, to wit, &c. William Henry Parkinson, the collector for the defendants, left, at the place of business of the plaintiff, a demand in writing of the said sum so due and owing from him to the defendants: "and afterwards, and more than ten days after the leaving of the said demand at the said place of business of the said plaintiff as aforesaid, he, the said W. H. P., then being such col-

By statute establishing a gas light company, it was enacted, that if any person should refuse or neglect, for ten days after demand, to pay any rent due from him to the company for the supply of gas, such rent should be recovered by the company or their clerk by warrant of any justice of peace for the town, &c., and it should be lawful for the company, or their clerk, or any person acting under their authority, with such warrant, to levy the sum so due by distress and sale of the goods of the party so neglecting or refusing to pay, or the same might be recovered by action, &c.

Held, that a warrant so issued by a justice, without previously summoning and hearing the party to be distrained upon, was illegal, though a summons and hearing were not in terms required by the act.

Where a magistrate grants a warrant in the nature of execution, he is bound first to summon and hear the parties, unless the statute under which he acts clearly renders the discharge of that function ministerial only, or in some other manner dispenses with the summons and hearing.

Held, that the warrant, although it would have protected the clerk or an officer, was no justification to the company, they not having acted in obedience to it, but having put it in force as parties.

Then followed directions as to the disposal of the overplus, and the return to be made to the warrant if the distress should not be sufficient. The plea then stated that Parkinson, so being clerk and acting under the authority of the defendants, did seize, take, and carry away, under and by virtue of the said warrant, certain goods and chattels of the plaintiff, being the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, for the purpose of levying the said sum, &c.; and did afterwards, and more than five days after such seizure, to wit, on, &c. sell, &c. for the purpose of satisfying and discharging the said sum, &c. Wightman in support of the demurrer. The point taken by the plaintiff is that, before a warrant was granted, he ought to have been summoned, or to have appeared without summons, before the magistrate, to answer the complaint. The defendants contend that no summons was necessary, either by the statute or otherwise, and that the demand by their collector was sufficient ground for a warrant. Unless the local act expressly takes away the proceeding by summons, the case falls within the principle of Rex v. Benn (a). But the act gives no authority for dispensing with a summons. (b) 4 G. 4. c. xxxix. (local and personal, public), sect. 72. enacts, "that in case any party or parties who shall contract with the said company," (established by sect. 1.) "or agree to take, use, or enjoy the benefit of the said gas, shall refuse or neglect after the space of ten days after demand made or left in writing at the place or places of abode or business of such party or parties, to pay the rents or sum or sums of money then due for such gas to the said company, according to the terms and stipulations of the said company, it shall be lawful for the said company" to separate his gas-pipes from their mains; "and that the rent or rents, sum or sums of money then due from any such party or parties to the said company for such gas, as also any other rent or rents, sum or sums of money due and owing to the said company for gas supplied by them to any person or persons, shall and may be recovered by the said company or their clerk or superintendent, or any person or persons acting under their authority, by warrant under the hand and seal of any justice of the peace for the said town of Liverpool or county of Lancaster (as the case may require); and it shall be lawful for the said company, or their clerk or super-

it is enacted, that they shall and may be recovered by warrant of a justice, but it does not say that the justice shall proceed without summons and hearing. And other modes of recovering the debt are given in that section, viz. by action, bill, plaint, or information. Now, in any of those proceedings, the defendant must of course have been heard; and the legislature cannot have meant that he should have that advantage or not, according to the course adopted by the Company. In an action he might allege payment, or some matter in excuse; why should he be debarred from doing so before a justice? But, unless summoned, he has no opportunity. [Littledale J. He cannot know what justice the opposite party may apply to.] Although the act does not expressly say how the warrant is to be obtained, it must mean that this shall be done in a regular manner, and according to the rules which guide this Court. The present act must be construed, as to the clause in question, like 43 Eliz. c. 2.

superintendent, or any person or persons acting under their authority, with such warrant, to levy the said sum or sums so due and owing as aforesaid by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the party or parties so neglecting or refusing to pay the same, rendering the overplus, if any, to such party or parties, after deducting the necessary charges of such distress and sale, or the same may be recovered in the Borough court of Liverpool, or in any of His Majesty's courts of record in England, by action of debt, or on the case, bill, plaint, or information," &c.

By sect. 74., any person "thinking himself aggrieved by any rule, bye-law, or order of the said company, or any thing done in pursuance thereof, or by the order or determination of any justice or justices of the peace in pursuance of this act," may appeal to the sessions. No further power is given, to justices or others, of relieving parties aggrieved by any thing done under the act.

There are many clauses in the act directing summary proceedings for the recovery of penalties, compensations, &c. They are noticed in the judgment of Patteson J., but need not be more particularly stated.

s. 4., which empowers justices to issue a distress warrant for poor-rates, and under which a summons has always been held necessary. [Littledale J. The warrant there is to be granted against "every one that shall refuse to contribute," which may imply a refusal before justices; here the words are more general, "in case any party shall refuse or neglect." Lord Denman C. J. I think you cannot bring the case within the authority of those under the statute of Elizabeth: you must rely on the general principle.] The legislature cannot have intended that, in any case, execution should issue without the party being summoned. It is an invariable maxim that no man shall be punished without being heard. No precise form of words is requisite in a statute to enforce this rule; but the strongest language would be necessary to sanction a departure from it. Rex v. The Justices of Stafford (a) was a similar case to this, and is an authority for the plaintiff. [Lord Denman C. J. We did not mean there to lay down a general rule: we thought it reasonable and just that the magistrates should have refused to grant a warrant without previous summons; but it would not follow from that decision that the issuing of a summons would be necessary to the defence in an action like this. In the present case the more general question is pressed upon us.]

Cowling, contra. First, even admitting that a summons was necessary, the proceedings were so far valid as to justify persons acting under this warrant. If the case fell within the jurisdiction of the magistrates, which the facts here shew that it did, the proceedings and warrant, though erroneous, are not void. In The Case of the Marshalsea (a) it is said, "a difference was taken when a court has jurisdiction of the cause, and proceeds in-verso ordine or erroneously, there the party who sues, or the officer or minister of the court who executes the precept or process of the court, no action lies against them. But when the court has not jurisdiction of the cause, there the whole proceeding is coram non judice, and actions will lie against them without any regard of the precept or process." In Dr. Webb v. Batchelour (b), which was an action of trespass for taking cows, it was found, by a special verdict, that the Plaintiff was called upon to perform statute duty under stat. 22 Car. 2. c. 12., but omitted to do it, whereupon a justice of the peace made a warrant to the Defendant to dis-train upon him under the authority of the act. The warrant was made without summoning the Plaintiff, though the statute, sect. 9. empowers the justices to grant warrants only against parties in default, "not having a reasonable excuse to be allowed by the said justices;" which makes the case stronger than the present. Yet the court there held, that the defendant, who made the levy, was protected by the warrant, saying, "The officer that executes the warrant (though unduly made for the cause alleged) is not answerable, for he is not to judge, but to execute the matter, it being within the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace." The defendants there were surveyors of highways, who had procured the warrant. It is suggested here, that the party, if summoned, might have proved that he had already paid, or was excused from paying; but, in the case just cited (a), Hale C. J. said, "You might have gone to the justice, though after the distress, before it was sold, if you had any excuse." And here the warrant directed that the goods should be kept five days between the seizure and sale. [Littledale J. How could the justice have relieved the plaintiff, if he had applied to him in that interval?] The plaintiff might have called upon the justice to order a restoration of the goods. At all events the present remedy is not a proper one. There is no hardship on the plaintiff, who must be taken to owe the money; and, even if there were, he might have obtained redress if the proceeding was improper, by an action on the case against the Company, for procuring a warrant to issue without a previous summons. A conviction may be set aside for such a cause, as in The Queen v. Dyer (b): or the court may refuse to enforce the granting of a warrant by mandamus; but the party acting under the warrant is not a trespasser. Powell J. said, in the case last cited, "that if an action were brought against an officer upon execution of this conviction, it would not lie, for an erroneous conviction would justify him." As to the effect of the want of summons, supposing it to be a material error in the proceedings, Ackerley v. Parkinson (c) is a case in some degree analogous, where a party was excommunicated for disobeying a citation which proved to be void; but it was held that, although the proceeding was irregular, there was no want of original jurisdiction, and therefore that the vicar-general

were not liable to an action on the case.

But further, the magistrates were not bound to summon before issuing their warrant. The decisions on this point, which refer to the granting of a mandamus, are inapplicable, and the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2. has already been distinguished from the act now in question. Magistrates, in respect to clauses like the present, do not act in a strictly judicial capacity, but in a ministerial one, nearly resembling a judicial. In modern acts it is usual to say that the magistrate shall convict, or to give a form of a conviction, when it is so intended. But the intention of the present and similar clauses is to give the same remedy as a landlord has for the recovery of his rent; by which name, indeed, the gas company's dues are spoken of in the very clause in question. Then, to avoid breaches of the peace, the statute, instead of giving an immediate power of seizure, requires the intervention of a magistrate's warrant, to give an ostensible sanction to the proceedings. It is argued here, that the warrant might be issued though the party had paid; but so also it may be said that a landlord might seize for rent, though none was due. If he did, the party distrained upon would have his remedy by action; and here, the same remedy may be taken if a warrant is obtained improperly. [Patteson J. The justice, in this warrant, has given five days for payment, acting as if under stat. 27 G. 2. c. 20. The local act does not call upon him to give any time; he therefore exercises a discretion in this respect, as against the parties obtaining the warrant. Then can it be said that he merely acts ministerially? Throughout the warrant he affects to act judicially.] It must be admitted that the warrant contains superfluous matter: but, if the magistrate proceeded judicially, the omission to summon is only an error, and does not affect the party acting under the warrant: if ministerially, that party is not liable, because the justice then was not bound to summon. It may be better, in a case like this, that a summons should issue; but the proceedings are not void for want of it. If a capias issue out of an inferior court without a previous summons, an arrest under it is not void so as to give the party an action for false imprisonment; note (1) to Pitt v. Knight (a).

Wightman, in reply. The warrant, here, shewed upon the face of it an excess of jurisdiction, and trespass would have lain for enforcing it; Groome v. Forrester (b). The defendants here do not stand in the situation of officers executing process, but of parties procuring it to be sued out. That distinction was taken in Parsons v. Lloyd (c), where De Grey C. J. said, "If the defendant" (the plaintiff in the suit then before the Court) "is injured, he is entitled to a remedy somewhere: but not against the sheriff or his officer, who are bound to obey the writ." — "The officer not being liable, the plaintiff must be. He has procured the writ to be sued out, and is answerable for all its consequences." (d) An officer justifies under the warrant;

(d) Patteson J. enquired if the warrant in Webb v. Batchelour was void upon the face of it? Cowling answered, that it did not appear that any summons was mentioned in the warrant (see Freem. 489.); but that, if it had, the justices could not have given themselves jurisdiction by reciting a false fact: *Welsh v. a plaintiff under the judgment. It is said that the present act was intended to give the same remedy to the company which a landlord has for his rent; but the remedy is a more summary one, for the distress may be sold immediately; and, according to several authorities, such a distress would be irreplevisable (a).

Lord DENMAN C. J. The first question is, whether the warrant in this case was a good warrant, justifying any person who acted under it? It is said to be so, under the seventy-second section of the statute 4 G. 4. c. xxxix. In order to decide this point, we are called upon to consider, on general principles, whether justices authorised by statute to proceed by warrant, in execution, may do so without a previous summons to the party to be affected. No case, as yet, has furnished an express authority on this subject, for, although Lord Kenyon intimated an opinion upon it in Rex v. Benn (b), it was not necessary, for the decision which the Court there came to, that this point should be determined. But, in the present case, I am of opinion that the warrant ought to have been issued upon summons of the party. The warrant states that the plaintiff, having contracted with the defendants for a supply of gas from them; refused, after demand made in writing, to pay the rent due to them for gas consumed by him, whereof he was duly convicted. The very terms of this warrant, referring to a conviction, make it evident that the party ought to have been summoned to shew either that he had not refused to pay, or that he had an excuse for not paying. Therefore we are called upon by general principles to

Then followed directions as to the disposal of the overplus, and the return to be made to the warrant if the distress should not be sufficient. The plea then stated that Parkinson, so being clerk and acting under the authority of the defendants, did seize, take, and carry away, under and by virtue of the said warrant, certain goods and chattels of the plaintiff, being the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned, for the purpose of levying the said sum, &c.; and did afterwards, and more than five days after such seizure, to wit, on, &c. sell, &c. for the purpose of satisfying and discharging the said sum, &c. Wightman in support of the demurrer. The point taken by the plaintiff is that, before a warrant was granted, he ought to have been summoned, or to have appeared without summons, before the magistrate, to answer the complaint. The defendants contend that no summons was necessary, either by the statute or otherwise, and that the demand by their collector was sufficient ground for a warrant. Unless the local act expressly takes away the proceeding by summons, the case falls within the principle of Rex v. Benn (a). But the act gives no authority for dispensing with a summons. By the clause for recovery of rents (b), sect. 72., it

(b) 4 G. 4. c. xxxix. (local and personal, public), sect. 72. enacts, "that in case any party or parties who shall contract with the said company," (established by sect. 1.) "or agree to take, use, or enjoy the benefit of the said gas, shall refuse or neglect after the space of ten days after demand made or left in writing at the place or places of abode or business of such party or parties, to pay the rents or sum or sums of money then due for such gas to the said company, according to the terms and stipulations of the said company, it shall be lawful for the said company" to separate his gas-pipes from their mains; "and that the rent or rents, sum or sums of money then due from any such party or parties to the said company for such gas, as also any other rent or rents, sum or sums of money due and owing to the said company for gas supplied by them to any person or persons, shall and may be recovered by the said company or their clerk or superintendent, or any person or persons acting under their authority, by warrant under the hand and seal of any justice of the peace for the said town of Liverpool or county of Lancaster (as the case may require); and it shall be lawful for the said company, or their clerk or super-

it is enacted, that they shall and may be recovered by warrant of a justice, but it does not say that the justice shall proceed without summons and hearing. And other modes of recovering the debt are given in that section, viz. by action, bill, plaint, or information. Now, in any of those proceedings, the defendant must of course have been heard; and the legislature cannot have meant that he should have that advantage or not, according to the course adopted by the Company. In an action he might allege payment, or some matter in excuse; why should he be debarred from doing so before a justice? But, unless summoned, he has no opportunity. [Littledale J. He cannot know what justice the opposite party may apply to.] Although the act does not expressly say how the warrant is to be obtained, it must mean that this shall be done in a regular manner, and according to the rules which guide this Court. The present act must be construed, as to the clause in question, like 43 Eliz. c. 2.

as to the goodness of the warrant. He is bound to obey it, and is, therefore, protected in doing so. But the company were not so bound. If they did not act upon the warrant they were in no way answerable; and they cannot justify under it if they have officiously used it. The case is not like that of persons called in to assist those who have a warrant to execute. This is an action of trover against parties who have received the fruits of the levy, and who plead that the goods were taken by their officer, and under their direction. They have officiously interfered in the execution of the warrant, and they have the proceeds. In Webb v. Batchelour (a) the parties held to be justified were those to whom the warrant was directed.

WILLIAMS J. There is no doubt that this was a judicial act. By sect. 72. of the Gas Company's Act, no proceeding can be taken, whether summarily, or by the ordinary process of law, for recovery of the rents in question, until the expiration of ten days after demand. A warrant, then, for the purpose of this levy, could not be claimed as matter of right, and without inquiry to satisfy the justice that it was grantable, any more than a warrant to arrest for felony. The act, therefore, being clearly judicial, the party against whom the application was made should have had an opportunity of shewing cause. Rex v. Benn (b) was decided under a different statute; and the judgment of Lord Kenyon, which had been referred to, went somewhat beyond the immediate question in the case: but I never heard the proposition doubted, that a party is not to suffer in person or in purse without an opportunity of being heard. As to the other point, the case of an officer executing process or a warrant bears no analogy to this. It would be wild work if the officer were entitled to scan the warrant delivered to him, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was regular or not under the circumstances of the case. But here, the persons justifying are parties who allege that money was due to them, and that the warrant was executed under their authority, for the purpose of satisfying their demand. The argument, therefore, on this point, which depended wholly on the supposed analogy between the present case and that of an officer, fails.

Judgment for the Plaintiff.

1885.

Friday,
May 29th.WENHAM against DOWNES.

An interlocutory judgment having been set aside, with costs against the plaintiff, by a Judge at chambers, and an attachment having issued for the non-payment, another Judge at chambers ordered that the defendant should have three days to rejoin, after the plaintiff should have purged his contempt. The Court refused to set this order aside, it not appearing that the plaintiff was in custody, or had paid the costs, or was unable to pay them.

AN attachment had issued against the plaintiff for non-payment of costs taxed on setting aside an interlocutory judgment by Patteson J. Afterwards (May 1st) Williams J. made an order that the defendant should have three days to rejoin, after the plaintiff should have purged his contempt.

R. S. Richards now moved for a rule to shew cause why this order should not be set aside. The affidavit stated the above facts, and that no reason for the order had been given to the learned judge, or by him, beyond the non-payment of the above costs; nor was any thing alleged at all on oath to induce him to make it. It did not appear whether or not the plaintiff was in custody. And it was urged, in support of the application, that the remedy by attachment was sufficient to do justice in the case, without staying the proceedings, which was unusual.

Per Curiam (a). We cannot say that the learned judge had no reason for making the order. It does not appear that the attachment gives any remedy; for the plaintiff is not stated to be in custody; nor is it stated that the costs have been paid, or that the plaintiff is unable to pay them. If any steps are taken to enforce the attachment, you can apply again.

Rule refused.

BASTARD, Esquire, against TRUTCH.Friday,
May 29th.

THE defendant made affidavit to the following effect:—

On the 20th of January 1834, he was arrested on a ca. sa. at the suit of a person named Slark, and lodged in the prison of the sheriff of Devonshire. In April 1834, while he was in custody as above, he, being indebted to Mr. Bastard in the sum of 222*l.* 5*s.*, executed a cognovit for that amount to him, on which judgment was entered up in Easter term 1834; and a ca. sa. issued upon that cognovit, which was lodged with the keeper of the said prison, on the 3d of June 1834, and the defendant was there detained upon the last-mentioned writ. In October 1834 a habeas corpus issued, to which the gaoler returned the last-mentioned writ, setting it out in the return: the writ by the return appeared to be a ca. sa. directed to the coroner of the county of Devon, “to satisfy Edmund Pollexfen Bastard, Esq. for 222*l.* 5*s.*” &c. There was also, in the body of the return, a certificate by the coroner that this was a true copy of the writ. On this return the defendant, being taken before a Judge, was committed to the custody of the marshal. No further proceeding had taken place in the suit, Bastard v. Trutch, nor had

Defendant being in the custody of the keeper of the prison of the sheriff of D., the keeper returned to a habeas corpus, that defendant was in his custody on a ca. sa. directed to the coroner of D., at the suit of plaintiff, which ca. sa. was set out in the return, with a certificate by the coroner that it was a true copy. It appeared by affidavit that the plaintiff was sheriff of D., but this did not appear in the ca. sa. or return, nor did it appear that there was any entry on the roll suggesting the fact. On motion to discharge the defendant for irregularity:

Held, that it was not requisite that the ca. sa. should mention the fact of the plaintiff being sheriff; and that a suggestion might at any time have been made on the record, if it had been necessary, since the rule Hil. 2 W. 4. s. 95.

It appeared by affidavit that the defendant being in the sheriff's custody at the suit of S., the ca. sa. at the suit of B., the now plaintiff, was lodged with the keeper of the gaol; but no facts were deposed to otherwise connecting the coroner with the keeper. Held, that the defendant was regularly charged at the suit of B.; for that it would be intended that the writ came to the coroner's hands, and it was not necessary that he should make a formal warrant to the keeper.

any roll been carried in, or proceedings entered up. On this affidavit, Archbold, in last term (11th May), obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged out of custody as to this action.

By the affidavits in answer, it appeared that the plaintiff was sheriff of Devonshire for the year 1834, on and before 11th of March 1834. That the defendant, being then in the plaintiff's custody, as such sheriff, in execution in two actions, one at the suit of a person named Davies, for 182*l.* 6*s.*, and the other at the suit of Stark for 48*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, escaped, involuntarily and against the will of the plaintiff, on the said 11th of March. Davies called upon the plaintiff to pay, and he did pay, the 182*l.* 6*s.* The defendant was retaken, 11th of April 1834, was sued by the plaintiff for his expenses, &c., and gave the cognovit, as before mentioned, for 222*l.* 5*s.*, debt and costs, upon which, default having been made, judgment was entered up in Trinity term last (not Easter, as stated by the defendant), and the writ of ca. sa. issued, directed to the coroner (the plaintiff being still sheriff), on the 30th of May 1834, and was lodged with the keeper of the prison on the 3d of June 1834. On the 23d of April 1834 the plaintiff carried in the roll. The affidavit did not state whether the roll contained an averment or suggestion that the plaintiff was sheriff.

Crowder now shewed cause. First, the writ was properly directed to the coroner of Devonshire, the plaintiff being then sheriff. It is true that the writ does not state that the plaintiff was sheriff: but that appears by affidavit. It is not necessary that the fact should be entered on the roll: in Pariente v. Castle (a) the Court refused to discharge a prisoner out of execution on the ground that no judgment was docketed and entered on the rolls. And, by the rule of Hil. 2 W. 4. s. 95. (b), "in order to charge a defendant in execution, it shall not be necessary that the proceedings be entered of record." The roll in fact was carried in; and, even if it do not state the fact that the plaintiff was sheriff, that does not make the process irregular. Secondly, it will be objected that the writ should not have been lodged with the keeper of the sheriff's prison, as it was directed to the coroner. But for this purpose the keeper is the coroner's officer also. This appears by the coroner's certificate in the return. And the Court will presume that whatever was necessary to constitute the keeper the officer of the coroner has been regularly done: the irregularity, if any, should appear by the affidavits on the other side.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, and Archbold, contra. The return does not shew a sufficient cause of detainer. It is true that, if the sheriff be interested, the process should go to the coroner; and, if the coroner be interested, to two elisors. But, if it appeared, in the proceedings, merely that process was directed to two individuals, the proceedings would be irregular: it would not be presumed that the sheriff and coroner were interested, and that the Court had appointed the persons named, to be elisors. So here the writ should recite that the sheriff is interested. In Done v. Sme-thier (c) the Court said that the proper method was to take a writ directed to the coroners, on the surmise of the facts in chancery. [Patteson J. In the case of jury process, there is a suggestion entered.] That was done in Rex v. Warrington (a), which case was relied on in a case upon a testatum capias, Letson v. Buckley (b). So in Rich. v. Player (c) there was a suggestion on the roll. The suggestion should be entered with a nient dedire. [Littledale J. Why cannot that be done verbally now?] Perhaps, on the authority of Brand v. Mears (d), if the plaintiff now produced to the Court the roll in the action, with the proper suggestion entered upon it, it would be sufficient, and the Court would not inquire when such entry was made: but it is not sufficient to say that the suggestion may be made; it must appear to the Court to be made, in order to warrant a writ directed to the coroner. But, secondly, the detainer by the keeper of the sheriff's prison, on this writ, is unwarranted. The defendant does not appear to be in the coroner's custody at all, in this suit. It does not appear that the writ was in the coroner's hands before it was lodged with the keeper, nor that anything passed between the coroner and the keeper. [Patteson J. The rule as to proceedings of this kind applies only where the defendant is already in the custody of the person in whose custody he is to be detained. But here the defendant was not in the custody of the coroner, but of the sheriff, at the suit of Slark. Littledale J. The coroner might make out his warrant to the keeper.] The keeper is not connected with the coroner at all, on these proceedings.

LITTLEDALE J. (e). There are two objections made to the regularity of this proceeding. First, it is said, that

nothing appears to authorise the direction of the writ to the coroner. I do not think it necessary that the facts should be noticed in the ca. sa.; that may be in the common form. Any entry elsewhere, which may be necessary to authorise the proceedings, might be made now, as often is done, and as was said to be allowable in the case of a fieri facias, to warrant a testatum fieri facias, in Brand v. Mears (a), referred to in the argument. But, by the rule Hil. 2 W. 4. s. 95. (b), the proceedings need not now be entered of record at all. The second objection is, that the defendant was never lawfully charged in execution in this suit. When a writ is directed to the sheriff, the mode of charging a person under it, who is already in the sheriff's custody, is to deliver it to the gaoler: then the law considers the defendant in the sheriff's custody under the last writ. That does not apply here, the writ being directed to the coroner. But it is said that there is no evidence that the writ ever reached the coroner. We must, however, give so much credit to the regularity of the proceedings, as to intend that it did come to him. Then, how was the defendant to be charged? The writ was taken to the sheriff's prison, where the defendant then was. What more could the coroner do? A warrant might indeed be made to the gaoler, but I think that is not necessary: the coroner might go personally to him with the writ, without any warrant. [Archbold mentioned that the coroner had made no return.] The coroner certifies the copy of the writ which has issued from this Court: that is in the body of the gaoler's return.

PATTESON J. There is no irregularity whatever. I take the fact of the suggestion for granted: it may be entered at any time, and need not be recorded. No entry on the roll is necessary; and the suggestion need not be on the writ. Then, as to the other objection, what is the coroner to do? He must bring the defendant to the county gaol. As to the argument, that it does not appear that the writ was ever in the coroner's hands, we cannot presume that the regular course has not been followed.

the Martyr in the same county. The rule specified various grounds of objection to the title of the defendants, which it is not necessary here to mention.

The defendants claimed to exercise their offices, as having been legally elected under the provisions of stat. 6 G. 4. c. clxxv. (local and personal, public), entitled "An Act for the better ascertaining, charging, and collecting of rates for the relief of the poor within that part of the parish of St. Andrew, Holborn," &c.; "for the better maintenance, employment and regulation of the poor thereof; and for regulating the nightly watch thereof." Section 5. of that act provides that the inhabitants of the places comprised in the act, and other persons assessed to the poor thereof, shall assemble annually, and elect persons to be governors and directors of the poor, together with the justices being resident householders, and the rectors, churchwardens, and overseers for the time being, who are made governors and directors ex officio; which governors and directors (by the same and the fortieth sections) may make orders, rules, and regulations for the government, relief, maintenance, and employment of the poor, and for ascertaining, charging, collecting, managing, and regulating the poor-rates, and for the appointment, regulation, and management of watchmen and beadles, and for the regulation of constables. By sect. 8. they are to present annually a list of sixteen persons to the justices, from whom the justices are to name four as overseers. By sect. 10. all messuages, watch-houses, edifices, and lands, used for the poor or the watchmen and beadles, all monies raised under the acts, and all other monies, fixtures, furnitures, materials, and other things provided for the poor or the

Sect. 12. provides that they shall calculate, ascertain, and settle the sums to be assessed and charged for the relief of the poor, for regulating and maintaining a nightly watch and beadles, and for discharging debts incurred by reason of deficiency of rates. Sect. 13. empowers the inhabitants afterwards to make rates to raise such sums, allowing for deficiencies in collecting. Sect. 24. gives power to the collectors, to be appointed by the governors and directors, to levy the rates. Sect. 25. authorises a justice to grant a distress warrant in cases of non-payment. Sect. 27. empowers the governors and directors to rectify omissions or mistakes in the rates. Sect. 28. empowers them to appoint, and remove, a clerk, collectors, treasurers, assistant overseers, inspectors, and such other officers and servants as they may deem necessary for the execution of the act, and to make allowances and give salaries to them (except the treasurers). Sect. 29. directs that such officers, &c. shall account to them. Sect. 32. provides that they shall annually appoint a sufficient number of watchmen and beadles, who, with the constables of the places comprised in the act, shall be under their direction and control. Sect. 34. enacts, that "all watchmen, beadles, and patrols shall and may be sworn in as constables before some justice," and "they are hereby invested with, and shall have and enjoy the same powers, authorities, privileges, and immunities, munities, as any constable or constables is or are invested with, or shall or may have and enjoy by law."

Sect. 36. empowers the governors and directors to repair, purchase, hire, or erect watch-houses, with the money raised under the act. Sect. 37. empowers them to appoint persons to remove paupers, in lieu of the overseers. Sect. 44. empowers them to purchase lands, &c. for enlarging the present workhouse, and building a new one, which lands, &c., by sect. 54., shall vest in them. Sect. 55. empowers them to borrow money not exceeding 6000*l.* on the credit of the rates. Sect. 56. authorises them to grant annuities payable on the rates. Sect. 63. authorises them to pay off debts. Sect. 69. gives an appeal against rates, or in respect of any thing done under the act, to the quarter sessions.

Sir F. Pollock, Merewether Serjt., Thesiger, Comyn, and Espinasse shewed cause in Easter term last (May 12th) (a). This is not an office for which an information in the nature of a quo warranto lies. The officers are not a corporation; nor is their employment in the nature of a public trust. The information does not lie for the office of churchwarden; Rex v. Dawbeny (b), which was acted upon in Rex v. Shepherd (c). The office here is not connected with any franchise of the crown; it is merely a substitute for the offices of churchwardens and overseers. If the information were granted, any office might be held to be the subject of it; as, for instance, that of a bank director. The office does not exist at common law, and is not so constituted by the statute as to be the subject of this information. And this is not a case without remedy. A mandamus might issue; or, as the tenth section vests property in the governors and directors for the time being, the title might be tried in an action of trespass. The information was refused in the case of a corporation, in Rex v. The Corporation of the Bedford Level (a). [Patteson J. That was on the ground that the officer in question was an inferior servant of the corporation.] It does not lie in respect of the office of clerk of the commissioners of land-tax (b). The question is not whether the jurisdiction be extensive, but whether it be of a public nature; in which latter case alone the information lies; as, for instance, in the case of the office of steward of a court leet, Rex v. Bingham (c); or the bailiff of a borough who has the return of members to parliament, Rex v. Highmore (d); and Rex v. McKay (e) is on the same principle. The language of the court in the more early cases was, that, even in cases of encroachment on the crown, they would not interfere, as a matter of course, by quo warranto. [Patteson J. referred to Rex v. Badcock (g).] That was decided on the ground of the officers possessing the power of taxation; but it is very shortly reported, and is in contradiction to the principle of the case in which it is cited. It is apparently the case cited in the unsuccessful argument in Rex v. Shepherd (a). Even the power which the officers here possess (under sect. 32.), of appointing watchmen, does not give to the persons appointed the authority of constables, till they are sworn in (under sect. 34.) before a magistrate. The governors and directors have no power to impose taxes or make rates; that is done by the inhabitants (sect. 18.). They cannot distrain without the warrant of a justice of peace (sect. 25.).

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, Sir W. W. Follett, Erle, and Jardine, contra. The case of a churchwarden (Rex v. Dawbeny (b), Rex v. Shepherd (c)) is distinguishable. That is an office the right to which may be tried in the ecclesiastical courts. This, not being a recognised common law or parochial office, is subject to no other proceeding than an information: the old doctrine was founded on the theory, that quo warranto lay only for an encroachment on the crown; but latterly the remedy has been applied to new offices, embracing extensive jurisdiction, but not encroaching on the crown, as in Rex v. Nicholson (d), and in Rex v. Badcock (e); the ground of this last decision was that the officers had power to tax the king's subjects. A mandamus has been suggested; but to whom is it to be directed, or what is it to command? the swearing in and admission cannot be commanded, for the election invests the party with the office absolutely. Rex v. Wix (a) a mandamus went to the inhabitants to elect a churchwarden.] Neither, again, would it be a convenient method of trying the title, that the opposing party should break open the vestry, for the purpose of laying the foundation of an action of trespass, or an indictment, to try the title. The remedy asked for is now speedy and economical. In Rex v. Bingham (b) the information was held to lie for the office of the bailiff of a court leet, who summoned and selected the jury; and, in Rex v. Goudge (c), for the office of constable. Here the office is equally public. The governors fix the sums to be charged for the poor and the watch (sect. 12.); which is not a merely ministerial power, like that of assigning the proportions in which the individuals are to contribute to a given sum. Under sect. 32. they have a compulsory power to appoint watchmen and beadles; and the persons so appointed “shall and may be sworn in as constables,” and are “hereby” invested with the authority of constables. Now, as an information will lie in respect of the office of constable, Rex v. Goudge (c), à fortiori it will lie in respect of that of the functionary appointing him. [Patteson J. LORD DENMAN C. J. in this term (June 17th) delivered judgment as follows:—

The Court have made up their minds that, in this case, an information in the nature of a quo warranto does not lie. The question is in a narrow compass, and has been distinctly and fully argued. In the case of Rex v. Hanley and Others (b) there was a difference of

In Trinity term, 1830, Joshua Evans obtained a rule to shew cause why one or more informations in the nature of a quo warranto should not be exhibited against the defendants, to shew by what authority they severally exercised the office of a trustee of the parish of St. Mary, Islington, in the county of Middlesex.

The trustees are appointed under stat. 5 G. 4. c. cxxv. (local and personal, public). The fourth and fifth sections appoint trustees; the sixth prescribes qualifications for the trustees; the seventh imposes the oath of office; the eighth, ninth, and tenth prescribe the election of trustees to supply vacancies, and also to supply the place of the trustees named in the fourth section, by persons assessed to the poor-rate at 90s. at least (sect. 37.), to be elected by occupiers of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, qualified as in the act mentioned. an information in the nature of a quo warranto would lie; secondly, whether, under the particular provisions of the act, the election of the trustees should be by ballot. The arguments on the second question are omitted.

Campbell and Holt shewed cause (Tuesday, November 15th, 1830, before Lord Tenterden C. J., Parke, Taunton, and Patteson Js.). The office is not public. The act creating the office must be considered, for this purpose, a private act, though the last section (152.) contains the usual provision that it shall be deemed to be public, and be judicially noticed; this follows from the ruling in Brett v. Beales (Moo. & M. 421.). In Res v. Nicholson (1 Str. 299.), the trustees of the port of Whitehaven had power to continue their own body, and they had jurisdiction over a haven, which jurisdiction must have originally belonged to the crown; and therefore a quo warranto was granted: but neither of these grounds exist here. In Res v. Badcock (cited in Res v. The Corporation of Bedford Level, 6 East, 359.), the commissioners, in respect of whose office the information was granted, had jurisdiction as to paving by statute (9 G. 3. c. 44.). Now, a road act or paving act is of itself public. It is true that here the trustees have power to make rates; but so may commissioners under inclosure acts, or overseers, for whose offices no information lies; and this is, besides, a very limited power, contingent only on the assessors failing to exercise their authority, and not extending to strangers. The information does not lie for the office of churchwardens, Res v. Dunsen (2 Str. 1196.), Res v. Shepherd (4 T. R. 381.). The office must be one of public trust, as in Res v. Hall (1 B. & C. 123.), and Res v. M'Kay (4 B. & C. 351.).

Sir James Scarlett, Attorney-General, and Evans contra. The office is of much higher trust and power than that of an overseer. The statute is in the nature of a charter. In Res v. Nicholson (1 Str. 300.) the Court said, " Informations have been constantly granted, where any new jurisdiction or a public trust is exercised without authority." They lie for the office of register and clerk of a court of requests created by statute, Res v. Hall (1 B. & C. 123.), and for that of bailiff of a court leet, Res v. Bingham (2 East, 308.), though mandamus does not lie to admit a vestry clerk, Res v. Churchwardens of Croydon (5 T. R. 713.), nor an information for the office of churchwarden. But churchwardens are re-

Wednesday, May 7th.]

The KING against BEEDLE and Others.

Wednesday,
May 7th, 1834.

KELLY had obtained a rule in Easter term, 1833, calling on Thomas George Beedle, the chairman of a meeting held on the 22d of January then last, for the purpose of electing a commissioner for the parish of St. Martin, in Exeter, to carry into execution the statute 2 & 3 W. 4. c. cvi. (local and personal, public) “for better paving, lighting, watching, cleansing, and otherwise improving the City of Exeter and County of the same City,” and also upon the commissioners for carrying into execution the said Act, to shew cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, commanding Beedle to enter or cause to be entered the name of Charles Henry Turner, in a book kept for the purpose of entering the names of the several persons elected in that parish pursuant to the said act, and to certify the election of the said Turner, as such commissioner so elected, to the clerk of the said commissioners, or to five or more of the said commissioners, in pursuance of the said act; and commanding the commissioners to hold a meeting

A local act created a corporation, consisting of sworn commissioners, with summary powers of seizure of goods and imprisonment of the person, and of preventing and removing obstructions and nuisances in the streets; powers for paving, cleansing and lighting; powers of appointing and paying officers, of determining the number of watchmen; of regulating them; and of dismissing, paying, or pensioning them; of possessing property in materials required under the act; of instituting prosecutions; of imposing rates; of appointing and removing treasurers, to whom penalties, imposed by the act, were to be paid for the purposes of the act; and of hearing appeals in certain cases brought by parties complaining of things done under the act. Held, that an information in the nature of a quo warranto would lie against persons claiming to be commissioners.

A part of the commissioners were elected by rated inhabitants, M. and T. having been candidates; and M. having been declared elected, and sworn in, and a rule nisi having been obtained, upon affidavits that T. had the legal majority, for a mandamus to certify T.'s election, and swear him in, the Court discharged it with costs, and at the same time granted a rule to shew cause why there should not be an information in the nature of a quo warranto against M.

for the purpose of swearing in, and then and there to swear in the said Turner as such commissioner.

The act directs the appointment of certain commissioners for putting the act and the powers thereof into execution, some of whom are to be commissioners ex officio, and some to be elected; of the commissioners to be elected, a certain number is to be elected by the parishioners and inhabitants of the several parishes and precincts within the city of Exeter and county of the same (sect. 4.); no inhabitant or parishioner is to vote at the election of a commissioner, unless he be rated or assessed to the rates, and at the amount mentioned in the act (sect. 8.); the chairman of the meeting at which such commissioner is elected is to certify the the name of the person elected to the clerk to the commissioners, or to any five or more of the commissioners, and the name is to be entered in a book kept by the parish or precinct (sect. 9.); each commissioner is to take an oath of office (sect. 16.); the commissioners are to be a body corporate and politic, by the name of "The Exeter Improvement Commissioners" (sect. 17.). Various powers of contracting for paving, cleansing, lighting, &c., are given to the commissioners (sect. 29., &c.). They are to appoint treasurers and other officers under their common seal, may remove or suspend them, and may give them salaries out of the money to be raised under the act (sect. 33.); the officers are to account to them (sect. 34., &c.); the treasurer is to pay money under order of five or more commissioners (sect. 38.); the pavements and their materials, all dust, ashes, &c. gathered in the public streets or places, all lamps, lamp-irons, and posts, watch boxes, watch houses, and other buildings erected by virtue of the act, and all materials under the act (sect. 109.); they may raise money by one rate upon landlords, owners, tenants, and occupiers in every year, for the purposes of the act (sect. 136.); and a lamp rate (sect. 139.); divers penalties imposed by the act are to be paid to the treasurer (sect. 180.); persons giving false evidence on oath before the commissioners are declared guilty of perjury (sect. 183.); persons aggrieved may appeal to the commissioners in the first instance (sect. 188.); the commissioners may reward informers (sect. 194.).

The affidavits set forth that, on a vacancy among the commissioners to be elected by the inhabitants of one of the parishes, Samuel Maunder and Charles Henry Turner were candidates, and that Beedle was chairman of the meeting at which the election took place, and declared Maunder duly elected. Statements were then made for the purpose of shewing that bad votes had been admitted for Maunder, and that good votes, tendered for Turner, had been rejected, which gave the former an apparent majority, whereas Turner would have had the majority, save for such improper admission and rejection. Beedle certified the election of Maunder, who was sworn in accordingly.

John Greenwood now shewed cause. The object of the present application is to impugn the propriety of Maunder's election. That should be done by a quo warranto information. Such a proceeding is applicable to the office in question. From Comyns's Digest, Quo Warranto (A), it appears that an information in the nature of quo warranto lies against persons claiming powers of the nature which this act gives to the commissioners; as for claiming fines, amerciaments, estrays; for claiming to be a corporation; for a claim of the correction of others; for a claim to have a prison, power of arresting, &c. In Rex v. Nicholson (a) it was held that an information would lie against persons taking upon themselves to act as trustees, under a private act of parliament, for the port of Whitehaven, even if there were no usurpation upon a franchise of the crown; the Court saying, that informations had been constantly granted, where any new jurisdiction or a public trust was exercised without authority. In Rex v. Boyles (b) an information had been granted, calling upon a party to shew by what authority he claimed to be bailiff of a ville, which did not appear to be a corporation, but the office was said to be “tangens regimen et gubernationem villæ prædictæ ;” and, on demurrer, the Court gave judgment for the crown. In Rex v. M'Kay (c), the defendant to an information not having traversed that the office was “of great trust and pre-eminence within the said borough, touching the rule and government of the borough, and the election and return of burgesses to serve for the Commons in parliament for the said borough,” it was held that the information lay. In Rex v. Ogden (d) an information was refused on two grounds; one of which was, that there was no claim to exercise any corporate or other powers, authorities, privileges, and jurisdictions over the rest of the inhabitants, although there was a claim to act as a corporation. The criterion recognized in these two cases, namely, the connection of the office with the government of the place, shews that an information will lie in the present case. In Rex v. Badcock (cited in Rex v. The Corpora- tion of the Bedford Level (a) an information was granted against persons exercising the office of commissioners for paving the town of Taunton, under an act of parliament, and not being a corporate body; and Lawrence J. distinguished the case, without disputing its authority, from the case in which it was cited, on the ground that a power was given to commissioners to impose rates and taxes on the inhabitants, which was a power even greater than the crown of itself could confer. Such a power is given to the commissioners in the present case. If a quo warranto lies against Maunder, the Court will not grant a mandamus; Rex v. Attwood (b). It may be objected, that the titles of the persons claiming to vote are not to be impeached by impeaching the title of the party elected; and that doctrine may be true, where the right to vote itself depends upon the tenure of an office; but here the right to vote arises from inhabitancy and payment of rates, qualifications which could not be directly challenged by a legal proceeding. This distinction is expressly drawn by Lord Kenyon in Rex v. Mein (c), and is also recognised by Bayley J. in Rex v. Hughes (d); and in Rex v. Hall (e) the right of persons to vote as householders was impeached in an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the party elected, and no objection was made on that ground.

Kelly contra. The application is, that the commissioners may be commanded to certify that Turner is elected; if they dispute the fact, they may deny it in a return to the mandamus. This is not an office for which a quo warranto information will lie. In Rex v. Nicholson (a) the Court rested their decision on the ground that all havens belong originally to the crown; and what was said besides was unnecessary. The decision in fact shews only this; — that, in cases where the franchise is such that it might have been granted by the crown, so that a quo warranto would have lain at common law, the information will lie. If an office be of the nature of those offices which are grantable by the crown, an information will lie, whether in point of fact the office in question be so granted or not: if it be not grantable by the crown, it is immaterial how it is actually granted, for the information will not lie in any case. Rex v. Badcock (b) was, indeed, an instance of an office not grantable by the crown; but there is no detailed report of the case: and it is observable that, in Rex v. The Corporation of the Bedford Level (c), in which Rex v. Badcock (b) was cited, Lawrence J. says, “It has always been considered that a quo warranto only lay for encroachments on franchises created by the crown.” In Rex v. Hanley (d) a rule nisi had been obtained for an information against persons claiming to be trustees of the poor of the parish of St. Mary Islington; and, though no decision was given upon this point, it was understood that the Court thought it not grantable. Yet there the commissioners had power to lay a rate. And, with respect to the power of imprisonment, the commissioners in the present case have not, properly speaking, that power, but only a power to arrest, like that of gamekeepers who may arrest in the night: and, indeed, the same power, with many others, is given, by the present act, (sect. 101.) to any of the persons there mentioned, who may see the offence committed. Lord Coke, in his commentary on the statutum de quo warranto (stat. 2. 18 Ed. 1.) says (a), "The quo warranto was framed for franchises which belong to the crown, and such as the subject hath, are derived from the crown, Libertates regales ad coronam spectantes ex concessione regum a corona exierunt." In Rex v. Shepherd (b) the Court refused an information to try the validity of an election to the office of churchwarden, on the ground that the old writ of quo warranto lay only for an usurpation on the rights or prerogatives of the crown; and that an information in the nature of a quo warranto could be granted only in such cases. In Rex v. Thatcher (c) an information was applied for against the person filling the office of clerk to the commissioners of the land tax, and refused: but the Court granted a mandamus to admit the relator, on affidavit that he had the majority of legal votes in his favour. If the remedy by information be extended to all offices of public trust, the consequence will be that there will be one rule as to proceedings by quo warranto at common law, and another as to those under stat. 9 Ann. c. 20. For the fourth section of that statute applies to such offices only as are before named in sect. 1., those, namely, of "mayors, bailiffs, portreeves, and other offices, within cities, towns corporate, boroughs, and places" within, &c.; and the provision as to costs, in the fifth section, applies to no other. Even admitting that the information does lie here, it does not follow that the Court will not grant a mandamus. In Rex v. The Mayor of York (a) a rule for a mandamus was made absolute, commanding the defendants to put the corporate seal to the certificate of the election of a party claiming to have been elected recorder, though the corporation had certified to the crown the election of another candidate, the dispute in fact relating to the validity of a vote. There Rex v. The Mayor of Colchester (b) was cited: but the Court said that the granting of the writ would not be conclusive against the candidate whose election had been certified by the corporation, inasmuch as it only required them to do the act, or to shew cause why they did it not: that is all which is sought by the present application. If the Court shall, however, decide, on this ground, against a mandamus, they may now grant a rule nisi for an information in the nature of a quo warranto, as was done in Rex v. The Mayor of Colchester (b).

John Greenwood, in reply. In Rex v. Thatcher (c) the mandamus was not granted till after the application for an information had been refused. The same course was pursued in the Patten Makers' case, cited in Rex v. Attwood (d). In Rex v. Bankes (e) Lord Mansfield said that, where an election de facto was doubtful, it was fit to be tried by an information in the nature of a quo warranto; but that where it was colourable and clearly void, a mandamus was a proper remedy; which was assented to.

THIS case is already reported, 2 A. & E. 615.

The KING against The Proprietors of the WILTS and BERKS Canal Navigation.

Friday,
May 29th.

A RULE nisi was obtained in Michaelmas term, 1834, (November 24th), for a mandamus to the company of proprietors of the above navigation, to allow Thomas Vincent, one of the said proprietors, to inspect all books, papers, and writings belonging to the company, and kept in pursuance of the statute after mentioned, and to take copies or extracts. The company was incorporated by stat 1 & 2 G. 4. c. xcvi. (local and personal, public), by which act, sect. 86., a committee of management was appointed to transact and manage all the affairs and business of the company, except matters expressly directed by the act to be done at a meeting of the proprietors at large. And, by sect. 95., the committee were authorised and required to appoint one or more clerk or clerks, and such superintendents, collectors of the tolls, and other officers as they should think proper for the better carrying the purposes of the act into execution. Sect. 101 enacted, that the committee shall enter into books, to be provided at the expense of the proprietors, a full and true account of all disbursements and payments made by such committee, and by all persons employed under committee. The proprietor attended the committee, and there repeated his request; and the chairman said they would take time to consider it. Ten days afterwards the proprietor applied again to the clerk, who refused the inspection. On motion for a mandamus to the company to allow inspection of the books:

them, and of all monies paid to or received by them respectively on account of the company; "and also a full and true account, or proper notes and minutes, of every contract, bargain, and agreement which shall be entered into by them respectively, for and on behalf of the said company of proprietors, and of all and singular their respective orders, transactions, and proceedings whatsoever, in and about the affairs and business of the said company:"—"and every such book, and all other books, papers, and writings belonging to the said company of proprietors shall, at all seasonable times, be open to the inspection of all the said proprietors, who may take copies thereof, or extracts therefrom, without fee or reward." Sect. 107 required the committee to keep an account of the rates, tolls, &c. to be collected under the act, and of the charges of the navigation and works, such account to be open, at all seasonable times, to the inspection of every proprietor.

Thomas Vincent, who made the present application, and was a proprietor of some shares in the navigation, stated, in his affidavit, that he had been informed by the clerk of the company, on inquiry, that the company's minute book and list of proprietors were kept by him, and all other books and papers belonging to the company by Dunsford, their superintendant, at the canal office at Swindon. Vincent further stated that, on the 18th of August 1834, he applied at the canal office, during the office hours, for "an inspection of the books, papers, and writings which were there belonging to the company;" that Dunsford's clerk, Dunsford himself being absent, refused to shew him any paper or book, except the account of annual expenditure; and that he thereupon wrote to Crowdy, the clerk of the company, informing him of the refusal, and desiring to see the documents at the canal office, and also the list of proprietors, and minute-book of the committee, which, as he now stated in his affidavit, he believed to contain an account of the orders, transactions, and proceedings of the company. That Crowdy said he would submit the demand to the committee on the following 12th of September; and that Vincent himself on that day attended the committee "to request a sight of the books, papers, and writings belonging to the company; and read to them the clause of the act under which he made the application;" whereupon the chairman said, "it was such an application as they had never had made before, and it would therefore require time to consider of it." Vincent also stated that, receiving no further answer from the committee, he wrote to Crowdy and Dunsford on the 18th and 20th of September, pressing to see the documents; and that, on the 22d, he went to Crowdy's office "and requested inspection of the books, papers, and writings belonging to the said company of proprietors in the possession of the said William Crowdy," but was told by a clerk that Crowdy denied his right to inspect them, and was from home. He called again in the same day, and received a similar answer, Crowdy having in the meantime returned home, and gone out again, declining to see Vincent. On the same day Vincent went to Dunsford's office, and, as a proprietor, demanded of him "an inspection of the books, papers, and writings in his possession, belonging to the company." Dunsford refused to give him an inspection of any of the documents, stating stating that he had no personal objection, but declined to do it until a judicial decision had been obtained on the subject. There were affidavits on the other side, contradicting the above statements in some particulars (which it is not material to state), ascribing Vincent's applications for a sight of the documents in question to malicious motives, particularly towards Dunsford; and stating that Vincent had, on the 18th of August, inspected the general accounts and book of disbursements at Dunsford's office; but that he subsequently applied again, and demanded to see every book and paper belonging to the company, and particularly the disbursement book shewn to him before, saying that he was entitled to see it as often as he pleased; a right which, as it was now sworn, would produce great inconvenience if exercised by every proprietor, the number amounting to nearly 500. It was also deposed by Dunsford that, during a meeting of proprietors on the 11th of November 1834 (before the making of this application), a member of the committee told Vincent that he might and should see any of the books and papers kept at the canal office on giving Dunsford proper notice; to which Vincent replied, that that would not answer his purpose. It did not appear that Vincent had ever stated his object in requiring an inspection of any of the books or papers.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, and R. V. Richards now shewed cause. The application is not made bonâ fide or for a legitimate purpose. At least the party applying ought to state some ground on which he desires to see the books and papers; Rex v. Clear;

Clear (a); especially in the case of a mere private company, which this is. It may indeed be questioned whether the Court would interfere at all in the disputes of such an association; Rex v. The London Assurance Company (b). The documents here are, virtually, in the possession of the company, not of their clerk, who is a mere inferior officer, and to whom no mandamus would lie; and it does not appear that there has been any refusal of inspection by the company. The intimation by the committee, that they would take time for consideration, was not a refusal.

The KING

Bere contra. Sufficient reason appears for the wish of Vincent, as a proprietor, to inspect these documents, independently of the motive alleged. After the statement of Crowdy that he would lay Vincent's request before the committee, and the answer given to him by the committee themselves, their neglect to give the inspection, and the other circumstances of the case, amount to a refusal. [Lord Denman C. J. Vincent does not state that he made any further application to the committee after they had said that they would take time.] It does not appear that they called any other meeting until November. Even now they do not state that they will grant the inspection. If any difficulty arises upon the form of the present rule, a mandamus may be directed to the committee, or to the clerk in whose possession the documents are. [Little-dale J. —
The King
against
The Writs and Banks Canal

A company, though in the nature of a private body of undertakers, is compellable by mandamus to do what its duty and the general interest require; and that has been held even in a case where the prosecutor might have proceeded by indictment, the Court saying that the remedy by mandamus was more beneficial, as enforcing performance of the duty; Rex v. The Severn and Wye Railway Company (a). And, where parties hold books and papers as trustees, the Court will grant an inspection to persons interested, without any specific reason assigned. In Rex v. The Governor and Company of the Bank of England (b), where a mandamus was refused, there appeared no parliamentary direction that the accounts should be produced. Rex v. Clear is distinguishable from this case: Bayley and Littledale Js. there (c) relied upon the words of the enactment, 17 G. 2. c. 38. s. 1., as not being general enough to entitle a party to inspection without his having some public ground for desiring it; and Littledale J. said, "It cannot be for the purpose of appeal, because the time for appeal has expired, and it is difficult to imagine any other reasonable purpose that the party could have."

Lord DENMAN C. J. There is no doubt that every proprietor has a right to inspect these documents. There is no particular officer to whom the care of them belongs: the committee have the power over them, and appoint officers, in whose hands they remain. Where the applications to inspect these documents may occasion inconvenience, it is reasonable that the parties upon whom such demands are made, should be informed, bonâ fide, of the object of the request. Here the party applying goes to the officers, and afterwards to the committee, who say that they have never had such an application made, and must take time to consider it. That, I think, is reasonable, and no refusal. The party should have applied to them again, so as to obtain an answer which might shew that they had exercised their judgment on his demand. Instead of doing so, he goes again to gentlemen with whom he seems to be upon ill terms, and who do not appear to have been authorised by the committee to return him an answer, but who make a reply which one is not surprised at. It seems to me that this is no refusal by the committee. They were the persons to whom the second application should have been made; and until they had refused, upon such application, there could be no ground for a mandamus.

LITLEDALE J. There is no question as to the right which every proprietor has under the act to inspect the books and papers at seasonable times. But the application, to ground a motion of this kind, should be to the committee themselves, not to their officer; and the party should tell them his object in applying. When the committee had said that they would take time, the first application should have been followed up by a further demand upon them. The answer given by the officers was no refusal by the committee.

PATTESON J. I am also of opinion that there was no sufficient refusal to ground this application. Every proprietor

HILL moved for a habeas corpus, to bring up John Pilgrim to give evidence before an election committee of the House of Commons now sitting, on a petition against the return of the two sitting members for the borough of Ipswich on the ground of alleged bribery. The committee had reported that John Pilgrim had absconded for the purpose of avoiding the service of the Speaker's warrant, and that he had been guilty of bribery at the election. Since that report, a warrant from the chairman of the committee had been served upon Pilgrim; and, after Pilgrim had made preparations to depart in obedience to the warrant, he was arrested on a warrant of a justice of the city of Norwich, on a charge of felonious embezzlement, and subsequently committed to the custody of the chief constable of the city of Norwich on this charge, for further examination. It was suggested in affidavit that Pilgrim himself was willing to obey the chairman's warrant, but had been arrested to prevent his doing so; and it was sworn that he was a necessary witness. Hill stated that it had been considered proper to make the application to this Court, without reference to the effect of the chairman's warrant in such a case, on the ground of the authority of the Court over all officers acting in criminal proceedings. A similar course was pursued in In the matter of Sir Edward Price (a), where the Court afterwards made the rule absolute, no cause being shewn.

This Court granted a rule nisi for a habeas corpus to bring up a prisoner, in custody upon a charge of felonious embezzlement, to give evidence before an election committee of the House of Commons, the rule directing notice to be first given to the Attorney-General, to the committing magistrates, to the constable who apprehended the prisoner, and to all persons at whose suit he might be detained on civil process.

I do not see how it can be done without the consent of the Attorney-General.] The case cited shews the precautions which the Court will take in granting the rule.

The KING against Sir OSWALD MOSLEY, Bart.,
Lord of the Manor of MANCHESTER.

H. occupied a warehouse in Manchester, within the jurisdiction of the court leet, where he carried on his business, but did not reside; and he usually lodged and boarded in Manchester from Monday till Saturday. He had also premises in Haslingden, in which township he slept when not at Manchester; and he did suit and service to the court leet of Haslingden: Held, by Lord Denman C. J. and Littledale J., and, semble, per Patteson and Williams Js., that H. was liable to be appointed a constable of the Manchester leet.

In 1808 finis of 100*l.* had been imposed

(and submitted to) for refusing the office of constable in Manchester, the parties finis not claiming exemption; since that time the duties of the office had greatly increased, and the number of resiants qualified to serve had diminished; and it was sworn that difficulty was expected in procuring persons to serve, unless considerable fines were imposed for refusing: Held that, under these circumstances, a fine of 300*l.* on a person merely refusing to serve by reason of an alleged exemption, was excessive.

(a) It appeared by the affidavit of the deputy steward of the leet, that the manor and township of Manchester are co-extensive.

prietors,

A RULE nisi was obtained last Michaelmas term for a certiorari to Sir O. Mosley, lord of the manor of Manchester, to remove into this court the record of the proceedings in the court leet of the said manor, relative to the appointment of Ralph Turner as one of the constables of the said manor (a), and to the fine imposed upon him for refusing to serve the said office. It appeared that Mr. Turner, having been elected a constable by the leet jury, was summoned to a court leet in October 1834, and there required by the steward to take the oaths of office, but refused to do so, and was thereupon fined 300*l.* The ground of his refusal, and one ground of this application, was, that he was not liable, under the circumstances after stated, to serve the office; and in applying for this rule, he made affidavit as follows:—That he resided with his mother (keeping, however, a servant, horses, and carriage of his own, and being assessed for them) in the township of Haslingden. That he and his brother kept a large manufactory in Haslingden, and farmed lands there, for which they paid 700*l.* a year, besides rates and taxes, having also other lands in the same township, of which they were joint proprietors. That they were subject in respect of the said property to suit and service at the court leet held at Haslingden, which suit and service they actually performed, or were fined when they omitted it. That they also jointly occupied a warehouse in Manchester as yearly tenants, and there sold the goods manufactured by them at Haslingden. That the deponent usually came to Manchester every Monday or Tuesday, and remained there, for the purpose of his said business, till the Saturday following, when he returned home; that while in Manchester he slept at a lodging-house; that no person slept at the warehouse; that he had no servant or establishment in Manchester, except at the warehouse; nor was he assessed to any rates or taxes in Manchester, except in respect of the said warehouse. It appeared by affidavits on the other side, that Mr. Turner (who was the chief manager of the business in Manchester) had, for six years past, occupied, exclusively, a sitting-room and bed-room at a house in Manchester, where he also boarded, being absent only at the intervals of time mentioned in his own affidavit.

Mr. Turner contended, further, that the fine, if any could be imposed, was excessive; and on this subject it appeared, that at the Manchester court leet, in 1808, fines of 20*l.* and 100*l.* had been imposed on two persons respectively, for refusing to take the office of constable; that neither of those parties claimed any exemption; that both fines were paid, but the latter was in part remitted: and that at that court another person was fined 100*l.*, which he paid, for refusing the same office. It was also stated by the deputy steward of this court leet, that persons elected to the office of constable had shewn great reluctance in accepting it; that the population of Man- chester and the duties of constable had much increased since 1808; that many merchants, who formerly had dwelling-houses in Manchester, had ceased to reside there, and to be liable to serve the office of constable, and their dwelling-houses had been converted into ware-houses; and that, unless a considerable fine were imposed upon persons elected by the leet and refusing to be sworn, it would be difficult to procure persons to execute the office.

Sir F. Pollock and Wightman now shewed cause. The question of resiancy was very fully considered, with reference to the duty of serving the office of constable, in Rex v. Adlard (a), where it was held that a party was not an inhabitant liable to such service in a parish where he did not sleep; and Abbott C. J. cited 2 Inst. 122., where it is said that "if a man hath a house within two leets, he shall be taken to be conversant where his bed is." Here the party sleeps in Manchester every night of the week but two. His occasionally sleeping in Haslingden cannot excuse him from serving in Manchester; if that were so, his sleeping in Manchester would in like manner exempt him from serving in Haslingden, and he would be subject to neither leet. But a man may be liable to two leets, in different places. In Rex v. Poynder (b) persons holding premises in a London parish, frequenting them for the purpose of business, but not otherwise, and residing in the country, were held liable to serve the office of overseer for the parish; but the question there turned upon the word "householder" in stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2. As to the fine,

The King
against
Sir
O. Mosley.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, and Colquhoun, contra. Mr. Turner is clearly a resiant in Haslingden, and actually serving on the leet there, or fined in case of default. He cannot be resiant, and compellable to take the office of constable, in two places, several miles apart (a). And, if so, Rex v. Adlard (b) must be considered as shewing that he ought to serve in Haslingden, and not in Manchester, where he is a mere lodger and has no house in respect of which he is rated. [Littledale J. In Cook v. Stubbs (c) it is said that "none can be of two leets;" but the question there did not relate to two different residences; it was, whether the lord of a larger leet could compel the attendance of resiants in a smaller, which was locally within it.] If the party here had been a rated householder in Manchester as well as in Haslingden, the case might have presented more difficulty. [Littledale J. Suppose he had had no establishment at all at Haslingden, would he then have been liable to serve this office in Manchester?] It is doubtful at least. A resident, not being a householder, may be liable to attend the leet; but more is requisite to qualify a man for the office of constable, which carries with it a great deal of power and trust, and to which a man who is not a householder may not be considered "idoneus." Then, as to the second point; the fine of 300*l.* is at all events excessive. The steward, who is the servant of the lord, acting for his benefit, cannot fine to an indefinite amount. In Com. Dig. Leet. (N 5.) it is said that fines imposed by the leet ought to be reasonable: the highest there mentioned is 40*l.*; and it appears to have been considered a question whether 5*l.* "for refusing to be constable" was excessive. In this case there was no contempt, but a bonâ fide question as to the liability. If the party had been indicted, and the case argued upon a special finding of the facts, the fine would have been only nominal, if the Court had held the defendant liable. On the former occasions referred to in the affidavits, fines of 20*l.* and 100*l.* have proved sufficient.

LORD DENMAN C. J. This rule must be absolute. I have not, indeed, any doubt of the party being resiant in Manchester, but he himself appears to have had a strong doubt of it, and such questions often are difficult. The fine imposed was unreasonable. It appears by the affidavits that a much smaller one was found effectual twenty-seven years ago; and it is impossible not to look with jealousy at fines which are imposed by the steward for the benefit of the lord.

LITLEDALE J. I think this party was a resiant within Manchester, and that he was a proper person to be appointed constable. A man is not to be exempt from such an office because he chooses for his convenience to live occasionally at a distant place. But I think that the fine was too great. I do not wonder that persons shew an unwillingness to serve this office; but the largest sum which appears to have been hitherto imposed is 100*l.*; and I think 300*l.* is too much at present, although though in the end a fine to that amount may become necessary. As to the sum of 5*l.*, mentioned in Com. Dig. from a case in 8 Rep. (a), allowance must be made for the difference in the value of money at that time; and, if the appointment was in a small place, a low fine might be sufficient.

The KING
against
Sir
O. MOSLEY.

PATTESON J. I am of the same opinion, on the ground that the fine is too large; but I do not mean to say that the rule would have been absolute on the other ground. It is not necessary to decide the point now; but I do not see why a man may not be liable to half a dozen leets (b).

WILLIAMS J. I also think the rule must be absolute. As to the liability to serve, if Mr. Turner had been serving the office of constable at Haslingden at the time of the appointment in question, I think he would have had a perfect exemption; but that this is not the case here.

Rule absolute.

The KING against HALLS and MINSHULL, Esquires, Justices of the Peace for the County of MIDDLESEX.

By an act for paving and lighting a parish, a certain committee was empowered to distrain for rates, and to sue for the amount if there was no sufficient distress.

The Metropolis Paving Act, 57 G. 3. c. xxix., subsequently passed, by sect. 38. enables any persons, having the control of the pavements of any parochial or other district within the jurisdiction of the act (of which districts the above parish was one), to sue for the recovery of the paving rates, and it imposes no condition as to previous distress. It further provides, that former paving acts shall not be repealed, but that commissioners under such acts shall retain and may exercise all the powers and authorities thereby conferred, and may act upon all and every the provisions, clauses, powers, and authorities of such acts, or of this act, as they shall find expedient.

Held, that the general power of suing given by the Metropolis Paving Act was extended to the committee established under the local act, and consequently that, in bringing actions, they were no longer restricted to the case in which no sufficient distress could be found.

BY stat. 23 G. 3. c. 90., "for better paving, cleansing, and lighting, the parish of St. Martin in the Fields," &c., the sole power of carrying the several purposes of the act into execution is given to the vestrymen and a committee to be appointed by them; and, by sect. 23., the committee are to rate the inhabitants for the purposes of the act.

Sec. 32. enacts that, in case of refusal or neglect, on demand, to pay the money assessed, "it shall be lawful for the collector or collectors of the said rates or assessments to collect and levy the money which shall be so unpaid, by warrant under the hands and seals of any two of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county of Middlesex, or city and liberty of Westminster," (such justices having first summoned the party,) "by distress of the goods and chattels of the party so refusing," &c.

Sec. 33. enacts, "That it shall be lawful for the said committee, or any seven or more of them, if they shall think fit, where no sufficient distress can be made, to direct and cause an action or actions to be brought and prosecuted in any of his Majesty's courts of record at Westminster, for the recovery of any of the said rates or assessments;" and, upon proof of demand and refusal or neglect of payment, the committee shall be entitled to a verdict.

1835.

The King
against Hals.

A dispute having arisen respecting the election of the committee in 1834, several of the inhabitants refused to pay a rate made and signed by nine of the committee. Summonses to attend before the magistrates were served on five of the persons refusing; and finally the defendants, being two such magistrates, declined to issue distress warrants, assigning for reason their doubts as to the validity of the election. In Michaelmas term last, Sir James Scarlett obtained a rule to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue, directing the two magistrates to issue warrants of distress for enforcing payment of the sums rated upon the five persons.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, and Platt, now shewed cause. The rate is not legal, the committee not being duly elected. (The arguments on this point are omitted.) Supposing it legal, the Court will not compel the magistrates to do that which may subject them to the risk of an action. It appears that they entertained a doubt as to the legality of the rate, which is enough. The proper remedy for recovery of the rate is an action at law. [Lord Denman C. J. That is given only where there is no sufficient distress.] The stat. 57 G. 3. c. xxix. (local and personal, public) s. 38. (a) gives a right

(a) Stat. 57 G. 3. c. xxix., entitled "An Act for better paving, improving and regulating the Streets of the Metropolis," &c. Sect. 38. enacts, "That it shall be lawful at any time or times hereafter for the commissioners or trustees, or other persons having the control of the pavements of any parochial or other district within the jurisdiction of this act (if they shall think it expedient), in the name or names of their treasurer or treasurers, clerk or clerks for the time being, or of any person or persons appointed by them to collect or receive any rate or rates, assessment or assessments, made or to be made for or towards the charges of paving or repairing the pavement of the streets or public places in any such parochial or other district, either exclusively or jointly with or for any other objects or purposes, to bring or cause to be brought any action or actions of debt, or special action on the case, or other action or actions, in any of his Majesty's courts of record at Westminster, or to proceed in any court of requests, or other court whatever (for the recovery of debts above or under 5l.) within the jurisdiction of which the said messuages or hereditaments in respect whereof such rates or assessments shall be made," [sic] "or wherein the person or persons or either of them against whom such action or actions or other proceedings may be brought shall reside, and against" . . . "any other person or persons liable to pay the sum or sums of money for or in respect of or by virtue of any rates or assessments made for or towards the expences of paving," &c. (as above) "by virtue of any local act or acts of parliament relating to such parochial or other district, or by virtue of this act, for the recovery of the sum or sums of money due" from any "person or persons liable to pay the same by virtue or in respect of any such rates or assessments; and that in any such action," (a general form of declaration is then given); "and that it shall only be necessary for such plaintiff or complainant to produce any such rate or rates, assessment or assessments, and to prove that the person or persons against whom such action or actions or other proceedings shall be brought," &c. "was or were the person or persons mentioned in such rate or assessment, or liable to the payment thereof by virtue of any local act or acts of parliament, or of this act, to entitle such plaintiff or complainant to recover" the whole sum proceeded for. And full costs are given to the plaintiff, if he shall recover the sum proceeded for or any part thereof.

Sect. 138. provides, "That neither any act or acts of parliament relating either exclusively to the paving or repairing the pavements of the streets or public places in any parochial or other district within the jurisdiction of this act, or relating thereto jointly with any other object or purpose, nor any clause, matter or provision therein contained, shall be hereby re-

Sir W. W. Follett and Channell, contra. The action does not lie, under 23 G. 3. c. 90. s. 33. unless there be no sufficient distress; and here that does not appear. Stat. 57 G. 3. c. xxix. does not repeal the previous act; it expressly reserves the powers of previous local acts, by sect. 138. Now the commissioners had, under stat. 23 G. 3. c. 90. s. 33., a limited power, in case only of want of distress: the subsequent act cannot be understood to substitute an unqualified power. Even supposing that the action were maintainable, there is no general rule that this Court will not grant a mandamus in any case where an action would lie. (They then proceeded to argue, that the mandamus would be the more convenient remedy; and, further, that the election of the committee was valid.)

1835.

The King
against
HALL.

Lord DENMAN C. J. This rule must be discharged, on the simple ground that stat. 57 G. 3. c. xxix. s. 38. gives a better remedy. That section seems almost

pealed; but that the commissioners, trustees or other persons by any such local act or acts of parliament vested with the control or superintendence of the pavement of the streets and public places in every such parochial or other district, shall retain and may exercise all and every the powers and authorities by all and every such local act and acts of parliament conferred upon them or any of them; and that they may from time to time and at all times either act under and upon all or any of the provisions, clauses, powers and authorities of such act or acts of parliament or under any of the provisions, clauses, powers and authorities of this act, as they from time to time, upon each emergency or each particular occasion, may think proper and deem most expedient; but subject nevertheless to all the provisions contained in this act as to "the appointment of surveyors of the pavement, the means provided for compelling the speedy and effectual reparation of imperfect pavement in streets, &c. within the jurisdiction of the act, the regulation and improvement of such streets, and the removal and prevention of nuisances and obstructions.

framed for the purpose of preventing the circuitous mode of proceeding by application to this Court for a mandamus. It is much better that the case should be tried, and the opinion of the Court be obtained, by that means, than that the Court should be put in motion to compel magistrates to do that which may subject them to actions of trespass, in which the same question must be ultimately discussed.

LITLEDAL J. It is suggested that, even if the action does lie, it would be more convenient to issue the mandamus; and it is true that by that proceeding all the money might be raised under a number of distress warrants; it is possible that on such distresses being levied, one action only might be brought, and the rest might abide the result; but it is also possible that every person might hold out, and as many actions be brought as there were warrants. It is not to be expected that the Court will direct distress warrants to be issued, when actions may be brought for the money, which will raise the question as effectually as actions of trespass against the justices. Then it is urged that the power under stat. 23 G. 3. c. 90. s. 33. is restricted to cases where there is no distress; but stat. 57 G. 3. c. xxix. s. 38. gives an unrestricted power, and is a later act: it therefore removes the previous restriction.

PATTERSON J. I am entirely of the same opinion, upon the thirty-eighth section of stat. 57 G. 3. c. xxix. This is a paving committee, consisting, if it be legally elected, of "persons having the control of the pavements" of a parochial district within the jurisdiction of the act. That gives power to them to bring the action, if they shall think it expedient; and it is subsequent to the act which gives only the restricted power. It is urged that the later act is not applicable where an earlier local act gives a power to sue: but I think that this argument is not correct, and that the later act has the effect of enlarging the power where the earlier act gives only a restricted power. There is therefore a remedy by action.

1835.

The KING
against
HALLS.

WILLIAMS J. I am of the same opinion. It has long been a rule that the Court is not, upon slight grounds, to issue a mandamus to magistrates, especially if it will probably have the effect of subjecting them to an action. Now the whole question is open to discussion upon the proceeding given by stat. 57 G. 3. c. xxix. s. 38. I agree in the construction put upon that statute; and, as there is a reasonable doubt with respect to the right, we will not force the magistrates to become defendants in actions of trespass.

Rule discharged.

The KING against The Justices of the Town and County of the Town of NOTTINGHAM.

The stat. 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 48. s. 1. does not entitle rate-payers to take part in the allowance at sessions of accounts charged upon the county rate, nor to inspect the items at the time of such allowance; the statute not altering the nature of the authority by which the allowance is to be made, but merely directing that the business shall be transacted in public.

And the Court will not grant a mandamus for such inspection, on affidavit by a rate-payer, suggesting that the accounts had been examined by the justices at a private meeting, previously to the examination in open court, and alleging that the applicant demanded an inspection of the accounts at the sessions, and offered evidence to shew the impropriety of some of the charges, but was not allowed to interfere; and adding that he could now impugn the charges, if allowed the inspection.

AT the quarter sessions for the town and county of the town of Nottingham, held on the 30th of April 1835, the justices in open court, pursuant to notice duly given, proceeded to the consideration of the bills and accounts of charges and disbursements to be defrayed out of the county rate for the said town and county; the clerk of the peace stating that they had been previously examined by some of the justices at a private meeting. Shilton, a rate-payer, being present at the sessions, required to be permitted to inspect the items, and offered to give information to shew the impropriety of the allowance of some of them; but the justices refused to permit him to inspect, or to give the information, or to interfere with the allowance of the accounts in any way. On affidavit of the above facts by Shilton, who deposed further that, if he were allowed the inspection, he could establish the impropriety of several of the charges, G. T. White, in Easter term last, obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to the justices to permit Shilton to inspect and examine and to have copies or extracts of the several bills and accounts, vouchers and papers, exhibited to, and allowed and passed by them.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, and Amos, now shewed cause. The stat. 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 48. s. 1 (a), does

does not vary the jurisdiction by which the accounts are to be allowed, but merely directs that the business shall be transacted publicly. The persons who are to transact it are the same as before the statute. There is nothing, in the statute, to give to the allowance the nature of a contentious proceeding, or to authorise rate payers, or other spectators, to interfere by evidence or otherwise. The intention was merely to impose upon the justices such a check as might be the consequence of the public nature of the proceedings. The bills which are allowed become part of the order of allowance, and are matters merely for the cognisance of those who make the order. Even admitting the applicant to have the right of objecting to the allowance, this is not the proper application: he should have asked for a mandamus commanding the justices to hear his objections; or that he might be allowed now to inspect the bills for the purpose ment of the county stock or rate, and of the funds in aid thereof, should be carried on and transacted by the justices assembled publicly and in open court at general or quarter sessions, or any adjournment thereof, and that a practice hath in some counties prevailed of transacting such business in private, which hath been found inexpedient: for the removal of such doubts, and preventing of such practice for the future, declares and enacts, "that from and after the passing of this act" [August 13th, 1834] "all business appertaining to the assessment, application, or management of the county stock or rate, or of any fund or funds used or applied in aid thereof or contributing thereto, or to any matter or things whereby or in respect whereof the said county stock or rate is or may be chargeable by law, which by any statute or statutes now in force the justices of the peace for that part of Great Britain called England are authorised and directed to do and transact at the general or quarter sessions, or at any adjournment thereof, shall be done and transacted publicly and in open court at such general or quarter sessions, or adjournment thereof, and not otherwise; and that no order of such justices relating to the matters aforesaid shall be binding or effectual unless the said order shall have been made and the business relating thereto shall have been done and transacted publicly and in open court as aforesaid."

of making such objections; but, if that were the application, it would have been necessary for the applicant to shew that he had made a demand that he might inspect, or be heard, at some other time than that at which the justices were assembled at quarter sessions; for he had no right to take a part in their proceedings then: and that is all which he has hitherto demanded.

G. T. White, contra. This is an attempt to evade the provisions of the statute. Such an audit of the accounts is public in form only. Independently of the late act, the rate payers have a right to demand the inspection of the rates: Rex v. The Justices of Leicester (a). And that case shews that, if, as suggested on the other side, this rule be too large in its terms, the Court will mould it so as to meet the justice of the case. There it was ruled that a mandamus should not issue, till inspection had been demanded of the justices at quarter sessions: but here that condition has been performed.

LORD DENMAN, C. J. This rule must be discharged. The applicant requires to be permitted to inspect the accounts allowed by the order of the justices; but it does not appear that he will not have that inspection upon demand: he could not have it with propriety at the time when he demanded it. If Rex v. The Justices of Leicester (a) be good law, the present case is not brought within it, for no demand has been made which could be complied with.

(a) 4 B. & C. 891. S. C. 7 D. & R. 370.

LITTLÉDALE J. I am of the same opinion. The course of the Court has always been not to issue a mandamus till a proper demand has been made.

The KING

PATTESON J. According to the principle contended for by the applicants, all the rate payers would become the auditors instead of the justices. The statute prescribes merely that the justices are to perform their functions in this respect in open court.

COLERIDGE J. The practice contended for would strip the justices of their jurisdiction. The statute simply changes the place where the discussion is to be: it must now be in public, and not in private. This application goes too far: even supposing it to be right in principle, the proper course has not been adopted.

tempt. In the affidavits in support of the rule (sworn April 23d and April 28th, 1835), it was alleged that Auriol was a material witness, that the defendants were acquitted in consequence of his absence and that of others, and that he was called upon his subpoena. The affidavits also stated what facts Auriol was called to prove. The affidavits in answer stated that Auriol was not regularly called on his subpoena.

W. Clarkson now shewed cause. First, the evidence was not material. (The argument as to this is omitted.) Secondly, the witness was not called on his subpoena, and, therefore, cannot be attached for contempt; Malcolm v. Ray (a). Patteson J. held this a fatal objection, upon an application for an attachment against another witness on the same indictment, in Hilary term last, *Rex v. But, thirdly, the application is at any rate too late; 1 Tidd's Pr. 807, 808. (9th edit.). The prosecutor should have applied in Hilary term, as he did in the case of the other witness.

Lord

LORD DENMAN C. J. It is not necessary to notice the disputed question of law. Perhaps the Court of Exchequer was right in saying that a contempt is committed simply by the neglect of a witness to attend. But, however that may be, in the present case the proper time for making this application had elapsed: in the case of the other witness the application was properly made in Hilary term. The party complaining in such a case should come at the earliest opportunity.

PATTESON J. I am quite of the same opinion. With respect to the former case decided by me, and which is the latest in order of time, the previous decision of the Court of Exchequer was not then brought to my attention. If it had been, I should, perhaps, have felt less confidence. Barrow v. Humphreys (a) is distinguishable. There it was ascertained that the witness was not in Court; and the plaintiff did not choose to go to the expense of swearing the jury and being non-suited. If you fix a witness with the fact of absence, I cannot say that it is necessary that the cause should be called on. If it be called on, the most convenient course is that the witness should be called on his subpoena.

WILLIAMS J. I will not decide on the question of law; though I am inclined to distinguish as my brother Patteson has done. But here the prosecutor has, at any rate, not been prompt enough.

*Thursday,
June 4th.*The Mayor and Burgesses of DEVIZES against
CLARK.

It is the privilege of a jury to decline finding any other than a general verdict; and, therefore, if the Judge explains to them, and they clearly understand, that, in the absence of a particular fact, the plaintiff's right to recover will depend on a doubtful legal question, and the Judge requests them to find that fact, if satisfied of its existence, but they, nevertheless, give a verdict for the plaintiff generally, and, on being pressed, refuse to find the particular fact, the Court will not set aside the verdict.

ACTION on the case. The plaintiffs declared that they were possessed of a market, on Thursdays, at Devizes, and that it was the duty of persons who sold butcher's meat at Devizes on market days to expose it for sale on certain stalls appropriated by the plaintiffs to that purpose, paying the plaintiffs a reasonable sum, to wit 1s. 6d. for the use of each stall, and not to expose meat for sale on such market days in any place in Devizes other than the plaintiffs' stalls; and that the defendant, not regarding his duty, on divers market days sold butcher's meat in his own house in Devizes, and refused to pay the plaintiffs for the use of their stalls. Plea, not guilty.

On the trial before Williams B., at the Salisbury Lent assizes, 1834, the plaintiffs proved that they were possessed of an ancient market; that, with very few exceptions, all persons selling butcher's meat on Thursdays in the town had always sold it at the plaintiffs' stalls, paying stallage for the same; and that, in 1803 and 1816, actions having been brought against certain persons for selling butcher's meat on market days at their own houses in Devizes, instead of the plaintiffs' stalls, the defendants in those actions had allowed judgment to go by default and had paid the costs. For the present defendant it was contended that the possession of an ancient market (which it was admitted the plaintiffs had proved) proved) did not necessarily carry with it the right to prevent persons, who lived within the town, from selling at their own houses on market days; Mosley v. Walker (a); that a right to prevent such dealings within the town could only be established by proof of a custom to that extent; and that the evidence in the present case was insufficient to establish the custom, there appearing an instance or two in which a butcher had dealt at his own house on market days. The learned Judge told the jury that, as it was still a matter of legal doubt, whether or not the right to an ancient market carried with it the right to prevent parties from selling in their own houses within the town on market days, and as the plaintiffs' right to an ancient market was admitted, he wished the jury, with a view to prevent further discussion between the parties, to find expressly, if they thought the evidence warranted such a finding, whether there was any custom in Devizes to preclude the sale of butcher's meat on market days in any part of the town except on the plaintiffs' stalls. Upon this, some of the jurymen entered into a conversation with the learned Judge, from which it appeared that they understood the effect of his observations as to the point left to them. After retiring for a short time, they found a verdict for the plaintiffs generally. The following conversation then took place between the learned Judge and the foreman: — Williams B. "Then, gentlemen, you find that in your judgment there has been an immemorial usage for the corporation to demand and receive this stallage for meat in the market, and that there was no right on the part of individuals to sell in a house or shop out of the market." The Foreman. "That is not our verdict; our verdict is for the plaintiffs; the right to the market is acknowledged on all hands: of course our verdict is to say, that the defendant had not a right to do what he is charged with doing." Williams B. "Then you further find, that the defendant had no right?" The Foreman. "I would rather not add any words." In the course of the conversation, the learned Judge said that an express finding might prevent further litigation, and the foreman said that the jury had been guided by the remarks of his Lordship; but that they desired to add nothing to their verdict. A general verdict was then taken for the plaintiffs. In Easter term, 1834, Merewether Serjt. obtained a rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial had, on the ground, chiefly, of uncertainty in the finding of the jury.

Sir W. W. Follett and Bingham, who shewed cause, proposed to establish that the right to an ancient market necessarily carries with it the right to prevent persons from selling on market days in any place other than that appointed for the market; but the Court confined them to the question arising on the conduct of the jury in giving the present verdict.

As to this, they contended, first, that it is the privilege of a jury to give, if they please, a general verdict only; and that, unless they deal contumeliously (a) with the directions

(a) "Also if a Judge, for the better direction and information of a jury, shall ask them their opinions concerning such a particular fact, and they shall refuse to answer him, and obstinately insist to deliver in their verdict as they think fit, contrary to his direction, it seems questionable whether they may not be fined in such a case also, unless an attain lie against directions of the judge, such a verdict will be upheld by the Court. In Davies v. Lowndes (a), upon the trial at bar of a writ of right, the tenant claimed to hold the property in dispute under a will; but the Court, with a view to render superfluous any question as to the effect of the will, requested the members of the grand assize, before considering their general verdict, to find whether or not the demandant, who claimed as heir of the blood of the person last seised, had established her pedigree to their satisfaction. The members of the grand assize found a general verdict for the tenant, and refused to express any opinion upon the demandant's pedigree; and, though a bill of exceptions was tendered on other grounds, neither the counsel nor the Court excepted to the general verdict. But, secondly, the jury in this case have in effect found the custom put to them. When they understood from the learned Judge that it was doubtful whether the right to the ancient market would of itself entitle the plaintiffs to prohibit the sale of butcher's meat on market days in any place other than the market, but that the existence of a custom to that effect would prevent further discussion, their finding that "the defendant had not a right to do what he was charged with doing," necessarily implied that they considered the custom established in proof; for unless they considered the custom so established, the defendant might, according to the direction of the learned Judge, have had a right to do what he was charged with doing.

against them, for that it is the duty of jurors to take the advice and information of the Court, in order to be governed by it as far as shall be consistent with their consciences." Hawk. P. C. b. ii. ch. 22. s. 22. (vol. iii. p. 284. 7th ed. 1795.)

Erle, contra. It does not appear but that the jury gave their verdict on the ground of the plaintiffs' having been shewn to be in possession of the market, and on the supposition that this, of itself, established the right claimed by them against the defendant. To shew that the jury founded their verdict on the fact of the custom having been proved, it should appear that they were directed to find for the plaintiffs or the defendant according as such fact was or was not proved. But this does not appear.

Lord DENMAN C. J. The plaintiff is entitled to maintain this verdict, if it was rightly given, and there is nothing to shew that it was not. It appears that the learned Judge explained to the jury that the question of law, whether the mere possession of the ancient market was of itself enough to entitle the plaintiffs to a verdict, was a question attended with some doubt; but told them that they needed not enter into that question now, inasmuch as there was direct evidence of the custom; and directed them to give their verdict on that evidence, if they deemed it sufficient to establish the custom. From what the jury said before they retired, it is clear that they understood him. Then they retire, and afterwards bring in a verdict for the plaintiffs. The only issue which they could so find, consistently with abstaining from any decision on the legal question, was the issue as to the fact of the custom. Then the Judge, with the purpose of making further discussion unnecessary, told them that, if they found the fact more distinctly, it might prevent further litigation. A conversation takes place, in the course of which the jury say, "of course our verdict is to say that that the defendant had not a right to do what he is charged with doing." Now, whether the defendant had the right, depended, at that stage of the proceedings, on the question as to the fact of the custom: finding the one was finding the other. It is true that the jury were called on to speak expressly as to the fact; but they had a right to refuse. It seems to me that they have merely exercised a right belonging to them, and that we should not be justified in disturbing their verdict.

Burgesses of

against
CLARK.

LITLEDALE J. The direction to the jury was correct in all points. It was left as a question, whether the immemorial custom existed in fact. Then the jury find for the plaintiff. That must mean, that the custom was established in proof. They are then specially asked, whether they find the existence of the custom, to which they answer, that they had rather not add any thing to their verdict. They have a right to refuse to do so. I am satisfied that they understood how the question was left by the Judge. The verdict, therefore, must not be disturbed.

PATTESON J. I am entirely of the same opinion. The jury had a right to find a general verdict: they were not bound to find any thing except in the terms of the issue. It is certainly convenient sometimes to act otherwise. I thought, when the motion was made, that they might not have understood the judge's direction; but, from the discussion, it is clear that they did understand it. No other question could be before them: the fact of the possession of the ancient market was conceded; whether that drew with it the right claimed, they were told was a question of law attended with with some doubt; and all this they understood. Nothing could possibly remain but the question of fact. Then they find for the Plaintiffs. What could that mean, but that they found the existence of the custom? But then we are told that, on the Judge saying, "then you find that there is an immemorial usage," they answer, "that is not our verdict." They go on to say, "our verdict is for the plaintiff; the right to the market is acknowledged: our verdict is to say, that the defendant had no right to do what he is charged with doing." This is apparently inconsistent; for, if there were no usage entitling the plaintiffs to exclude the defendant from selling as he did, the defendant might have the right. But what is the real effect of the whole? Why, that when they say "that is not our verdict," they mean, that it is not their verdict totidem verbis. But the effect of the verdict is a different matter from the expression of it. In effect, the meaning is that they find the custom in fact. The verdict, therefore, is not to be disturbed.

WILLIAMS J. When I left the case to the jury all the cases were under my notice. The doubts of Mr. Justice Bayley and Mr. Justice Holroyd in Mosley v. Walker (a), and the question stated by my brother Little-dale in The Mayor of Macclesfield v. Pedley (b), were all before me. The jury understood the question of fact as distinguished from the question of law, and that it was not quite settled whether an immemorial market necessarily drew with it the right claimed. I entertain no doubt whatever, that their only object was to rely on their general right to give a general verdict, and to abstain from expressly finding the special point. Although they said "that is not our verdict," they went on to find a verdict which they could not give unless they found the fact left to them; for what else could be their meaning, when they said, "the defendant had no right to do what he is charged with doing?" I thought then that they had a right to find a general verdict, and I think so now.

DOE on the Demise of ROGERS against BROOKS. Friday,
June 5th.

ON the trial of this ejectment before Littledale J. at the Summer assizes for Sussex, 1834, the following facts appeared. In 1805 a feoffment in fee of the land was made to one Robert Allen. By indenture of December 26, 1817, between Thomas Clayton and Edward Hide of the first part, the said Robert Allen of the second part, and John Parsons of the third part; after reciting an indenture of March 22d, 1815, between the said Allen of the first part, and the said Clayton

An indenture of mortgage, of 1817, recited that, by a former indenture, of 1815, A., in consideration of 200*l.* conveyed the premises, of which he was tenant in fee, to C. and H. for 1000 years, subject to a proviso of redemption; that

P., at the request of A., had paid C. and H. the 200*l.* and advanced a further sum to A., and that, in consideration thereof, C. and H., at A.'s request, did assign, and A. did grant, &c., to P. the premises comprised in the original mortgage, from thenceforth for all the residue of the said term of 1000 years, subject to a new proviso of redemption. In ejectment brought by the representatives of P. against those of A.:

Held, that the deed of 1817 (with proof of A.'s seisin in fee) was sufficient evidence of title in P., without production of the deed of 1815: that, if the recital of the former deed were admissible, it must be taken all together, and shewed a right in C. and H. to assign the term; and, if it were rejected, nothing appeared to prevent A., as tenant in fee, from granting a term to P.:

That, if the recital in the deed of 1817 were rejected as proof of a right in C. and H. to assign, it might still be looked to for the purpose of ascertaining what term was intended to pass by the deed. And that from the whole of this deed it might be collected that the residue of a term of 1000 years, commencing in 1815, was granted to P. from 1817.

and Hide of the other part, whereby, in consideration of 200*l.* paid to Allen by Clayton and Hide, the said Allen did grant, demise, bargain, and sell to Clayton and Hide, their executors, &c. all that the said piece or parcel of ground, together with the messuage or dwelling-house, &c. then standing thereon, and which said piece or parcel of ground was, by a certain indenture of feoffment, bearing date December 23d, 1605, conveyed to the use of the said Allen and his heirs, with the appurtenances, to hold unto the said Clayton and Hide, and their executors, &c., from thenceforth for 1000 years, sans waste, subject to a proviso of redemption on payment to Clayton and Hide of 200*l.* and interest, on the 22*d* of September then next: And after further reciting that the said 200*l.* was then due to Clayton and Hide, who had applied for it to Allen, and that Allen had requested Parsons to lend him 200*l.*, and a further sum of 100*l.*, which he had agreed to do: It was witnessed that, in consideration of 200*l.* paid by Parsons to Clayton and Hide at Allen's request, and 100*l.* paid to Allen by Parsons, the said Clayton and Hide, at the request and direction of Allen, did each of them bargain, sell, assign, &c., and Allen did grant, demise, bargain, sell, ratify, and confirm to Parsons, his executors, &c., all that the said piece or parcel of ground, messuage, and all other the premises comprised in and demised, or expressed to be demised, by the before in part recited indenture of mortgage of March 1815, with the appurtenances, and all the estate, &c., habendum to Parsons, his executors, &c., from thenceforth for all the residue and remainder then to come and unexpired of the said term of 1000 years, freed and discharged from the proviso for redemption contained in the said recited indenture, but subject to another proviso for redemption, viz. a proviso for re-assignment, on payment by Allen, his heirs, executors, &c., to Parsons, his executors, &c., of 300*l.*, and interest, on the 26th of June then next. Parsons bequeathed all his personalty (with some exceptions not material), and the lands to which he was entitled for any term in mortgage, to Rogers, the lessor of the Plaintiff. The defendant claimed under the will of Allen, the mortgagor.

The plaintiff put in the indentures of 1805 and 1817, but not the mortgage of 1815, insisting that formal proof of this was rendered unnecessary by the recital in the deed of 1817. The defendant urged that he, being a stranger to that deed, could not be bound by its recitals. The learned Judge directed a nonsuit, giving leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, if the court should think his proof of title sufficient. A rule nisi was obtained accordingly, and, in Easter term last (a),

Comyn shewed cause, and Hollist supported the rule. The points discussed in argument will sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court, which was now delivered by

LORD DENMAN C. J. His Lordship, after stating the circumstances under which the motion was made, proceeded as follows. Upon consideration, the proof of title appears to us to be sufficient. In order to make the deed of 1817 per se sufficient, it is necessary that by it a term of years in possession should have passed to Parsons. Allen was proved aliunde to be seised in fee; but it was objected that by that deed he stated himself to have made an effective grant of the premises for 1000 years, and therefore could grant nothing but an interest subject to that term; and that, although the grantees joined in the deed of 1817, and assigned their interest to Parsons, yet their act could avail nothing, because there was no proof, by the production of the deed, of any interest in them. This is not a tenable objection; the recital must be taken altogether; it either proves an interest in Clayton and Hyde, or it does not: if the former, then Clayton and Hyde effectually assign it to Parsons: if the latter, the difficulty raised by the supposed intervention of their estate vanishes, and Allen remains tenant in fee capable of creating a term in immediate possession.

But it is further objected that if the recitals be struck out of the deed of 1817, there is no sufficient certainty of description of the interest conveyed by it. Allen will then be the grantor, it is said, and he professes only to grant the residue of a term created by a former deed, which it is necessary to look into, in order to see what that term was, and when commencing. But the answer to this objection is, that it is sufficient if it can be collected from the whole deed what the interest was which it was intended to convey by it; and that, for this purpose, the recitals may properly be looked to as the language of the granting party; that, when those recitals are looked to, it appears with sufficient clearness that Allen, by the hypothesis supposed to be a tenant in fee in possession, conveys a term for so much of 1000 years commencing on the twenty-second of March 1815,

Either way, therefore, the title is complete. If the recitals are of force to raise an objection, the execution of the deed by Clayton and Hyde is of force to remove it: if they are not allowed to operate as raising an objection, still they may legitimately be looked to as completing the description of the premises.

COVENANT. The alleged breaches were of covenants in a lease, to pay rent and to keep in repair. Plea, non est factum. At the trial, before Coleridge J., at the sittings in Middlesex in this term, it appeared that the instrument declared upon was an indenture between John Copland of the first part, Pierre François Laporte of the second part, and John Hamilton Reynolds of the third part, beginning as follows: — “Whereas the said *P. obtained a verdict for 104*l.* 8*s.*, three quarters' rent, and 72*l.*, dilapidations, leave being reserved to move as after-mentioned.

Hill, in this term (a), moved for a rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be reduced by the amount given for dilapidations. Reynolds was not liable under the covenant to repair. The only joint covenant was for the payment of rent. The recitals shew that this, and nothing more, was intended, although it may be argued that in the clauses following the covenant for payment of rent nothing is inserted to shew that a joint liability is no longer contemplated. The covenant for rent is distinguished from the others in the proviso for re-entry, where it is said that that right shall accrue if the rent reserved, or any part thereof, shall be in arrear and unpaid for the space of twenty-one days, &c., "or if the said P. F. Laporte, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall not well and truly observe and perform all and every the covenants and agreements herein contained on his and their part to be observed and performed."

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court. We think that in this case the defendants jointly covenanted that both should pay the rent, and that Laporte, the lessee, should keep the premises in repair. The language of the recitals does not go to so great an extent, but it is not inconsistent with this view of the covenants. There will, therefore, be no rule.

Conclusion to the country. Demurrer, assigning for cause that the plea concludes to the country, whereas it ought to have concluded with a verification. No other special cause was assigned. Joinder in demurrer.

A plea, to assumpsit by drawer against acceptor of a bill of exchange, "that Defendant received no good or sufficient consideration from plaintiff for accepting the bill" is bad on demurrer, though the plea be not specially demurred to for that defect.

Hindmarch in support of the demurrer. The plea is bad on the special ground assigned. And a plea, that the defendant did not receive any good or sufficient consideration from the plaintiff, is no answer. It should have expressly stated how the bill came to be accepted. If, for instance, it was accepted for accommodation, or to guarantee the debt of a third person, that should have been alleged. The plea, as now framed, does not exclude those cases. A similar plea has lately been held bad in the Court of Exchequer (a). (Here he was stopped by the Court).

Lord DENMAN C. J. I do not know what is meant here by "good or sufficient consideration." "Consideration" seems to be put, by a strange use of words, in the place of "value." We can assign no meaning to the language of the plea,

A plea to assumpsit by indorsee of B. against a prior indorser, that defendant had no consideration for indorsing, and that B. indorsed to plaintiff without any consideration, and that plaintiff had, always held without any consideration, is bad in substance,

ASSUMPSIT on a promissory note indorsed by defendant to Bingham, and by Bingham to plaintiff. Plea, that defendant never had any consideration for indorsing the note; that Bingham indorsed it to plaintiff without any consideration, and that plaintiff had always held it without any consideration. Replication, that defendant had consideration for indorsing, and that Bingham indorsed to plaintiff with consideration: conclusion to the country. Mansel, in support of the demurrer. The replication is bad. It cannot be contended, after the case of Bramah v. Baker (a), that the plaintiff was bound to set out all the particulars of the consideration; but here, he merely states that the defendant had consideration for indorsing, and that Bingham indorsed with consideration. It may be collected from the judgment of Tindal C. J. in Bramah v. Baker (a), that the replication ought, at least, to state that there was a good and valuable consideration. It was so alleged there, and that the consideration was money due from the plaintiffs. Here, nothing of the kind is averred. The plaintiff takes upon him to allege that there was a consideration, but, upon his statement, the consideration might be one which was not good or valid. [Lord Denman C. J. Is not the replication as good as the plea? That merely alleges that the note was indorsed to the plaintiff "without any consideration." What do those words signify? Their natural sense is, without reflection. It is impossible to say, from the popular use of terms, what the plea means. WILES against R. B. COOPER, Esquire, and Two Others.

Quære, whether, under stat. 20 G. 2. c. 19. and 4 G. 4. c. 34., justices have power to order payment on an information stating that a sum is due to the complainant "for wages for labour as a carpenter."

The stat. 5 G. 4. c. 18. s. 2. does not empower justices to commit in default of distress, for nonpayment of wages.

THIS was an action of trespass and false imprisonment. Plea, the general issue. The following case was stated by consent, pursuant to stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 25.

The plaintiff is a carpenter and joiner, living at Cheltenham. The defendants were at the time of the imprisonment, and still are, justices of the peace for the county of Gloucester. On the 1st of May 1834, Aaron Willicombe laid the following information against the plaintiff before the defendant Cooper.

"Public office, Cheltenham.

"County of Gloucester, to wit. — The information and complaint of Aaron Willicombe of the parish of Cheltenham, in the county of Gloucester, upon oath before me one of his Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Gloucester, this first day of May 1834, who saith that there is due to him from Charles Wiles, for wages for labour as a carpenter, the sum of 2*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, which he has neglected to pay.

Charles

"Aaron Willicombe."

"Before me, R. Bransby Cooper."

The plaintiff was summoned to appear and answer the complaint, and appeared accordingly at the next petty sessions at the public office, Cheltenham, on the 3*d* of May, before the three defendants, who were then the sitting magistrates. Willicombe also appeared, and made a statement, the minute of which, taken at the public office, was as follows:—

"3*d* May 1834.

"Aaron Willicombe, sworn, saith, there is due to me from Charles Wiles 2*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* for wages as a journeyman carpenter at 14*s.* a week."

The defendants heard the plaintiff's statement in answer, which did not satisfy them that the said wages were not due as deposed by Willicombe; they therefore ordered the plaintiff to pay the 2*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* and 4*s.* 6*d.* costs, forthwith. The plaintiff said that he could not pay, and had not sufficient goods and chattels whereupon the amount could be levied by distress. The defendants then made their warrant, addressed to the constable of Cheltenham, and the keeper of the House of Correction at Northleach, and the body of which was follows:—

"Whereas Aaron Willicombe of Cheltenham aforesaid, on the 1*st* day of May instant, complained unto one of his Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, that Charles Wiles of Cheltenham aforesaid, had refused or neglected to pay unto him the said *A. him from the said C. W., for work and labour as a servant in the business of a carpenter duly performed by him the said A. W. for him the said C. W. at Cheltenham aforesaid; and whereas the said C. W., having been duly summoned to answer the said complaint, did appear in pursuance of such summons, but did not prove to us, three of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Gloucester, that the said wages had been paid to the said A. W., and did not shew any just cause why the same should not be paid: therefore the said justices, upon due examination and consideration had thereof on this 3d day of May, by writing under their hands did adjudge, determine, and order that the said C. W. should forthwith pay to him the said A. W. the sum of 2*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, which appeared to the said justices to be just and reasonable to be paid by him the said C. W. to him the said A. W., and the sum of 4*s.* 6*d.* for costs, making together the sum of 2*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.* And whereas it appears unto us, three of his Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Gloucester, by the confession of the said C. W., that the said C. W. hath not sufficient goods or chattels whereon to levy the said sums, and that the said C. W. hath not paid the said sums, or any part thereof, but therein hath wholly made default: these are, therefore, in his Majesty's name, in pursuance of the statute made and passed in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty king George the Fourth, intituled "An Act for the more effectual recovery of penalties before justices and magistrates on conviction of offenders; and for facilitating the execution of warrants by constables," to command you, the constable of Cheltenham aforesaid, to take the said C. W., and him safely convey convey to the house of correction at Northleach aforesaid, and deliver him to the said keeper thereof. And we do hereby command you, the said keeper of the said house of correction, to receive the said C. W. into the said house of correction, there to imprison him for the space of two calendar months, unless the said sum of '2*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.* shall be sooner paid, or until he shall be discharged by due course of law, and for your so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant. Given," &c. May 3d, 1834. Signed and sealed by the three justices.

The plaintiff remained in prison eight days, and then paid the said monies and was discharged.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were: First, whether the defendants were empowered by the statutes 20 G. 2. c. 19. and 4 G. 4. c. 34., to order and adjudge the plaintiff to pay the said sums in manner before mentioned. Secondly, whether upon nonpayment of those monies, and upon the plaintiff's confession that he had not sufficient goods and chattels whereon the same might be levied, the defendants were empowered by the statute 5 G. 4. c. 18., to commit the plaintiff to prison for two calendar months, unless the said monies should be sooner paid. If the Court should decide in the affirmative, a nolle prosequi was to be entered: if in the negative, judgment to be entered for the plaintiff by confession, for 5*l.* damages.

As to the first point, it does not appear on the face of these proceedings that Willcombe had contracted to serve the defendant; and, unless the relation of master and servant was established between them, the power given to the justices by stat. 4 G. 4. c. 34. s. 5., of enforcing by distress the pay-

Secondly, however the first point may be determined, the statute 5 G. 4. c. 18. (d) does not extend the power of

R. V. Richards, contra. First, the interference of the justices in this case was under stat. 20 G. 2. c. 19. s. 1., and 4 G. 4. c. 34. s. 5. The enumeration of persons in the first of these clauses is sufficiently large to include a carpenter; and there is nothing in either to prevent such a person from recovering his wages, though he may not have been working by contract. It is supposed, however, that the third section of stat. 4 G. 4.

"to issue forth his or their warrant for committing such offender or defendant to the common gaol for any term not exceeding three calendar months, unless the sum adjudged to be paid, and all costs and charges of the proceedings, shall be sooner paid."

SECT. 3. "And be it further enacted, that in the case of any offender or offenders committed to the common gaol or house of correction for default of payment of such penalty or forfeiture, together with the reasonable costs and charges attending the conviction, if such offender or offenders shall at any time, during the period of his, her or their imprisonment, pay or cause to be paid to the governor or keeper of the prison, the full amount of such penalty, together with the costs and charges, it shall be lawful for such governor or keeper of such prison, and he or they are hereby required forthwith to discharge such offender or offenders from his or their custody."

c. 34., which requires a service by contract, controls, in this respect, the subsequent sections, and the provisions of the former act. Even assuming this to be so, the case here states that Willicombe had earned the wages as a journeyman carpenter, at 14s. a week. That implies his being hired as a servant by the week. But the act 20 G. 2. c. 19. does not warrant the limitation attempted (a). [Williams J. In Lowther v. The Earl of Radnor (b), under that act, stress was laid by the Court upon the generality of the words in sect. 1., "other labourers employed for any certain time, or in any other manner."] Secondly, it must have been intended that the remedy afforded by stat. 5 G. 4. c. 18. should be available in the case of wages, and that parties should not be driven to an indictment where payment is ordered and not made. The judgments of the Court in Hutchinson v. Lowndes (c), particularly that of Patteson J., are strongly in favour of this opinion.

LORD DENMAN C. J.: The statute 5 G. 4. c. 18. seems to me applicable to the case of penalties and forfeitures, and not to that of orders for the payment of wages. The case of Hutchinson v. Lowndes (c) was argued only on one side. If a rule had been granted, the opposing counsel would probably have directed attention to this point. As it was, the objection to the commitment was sufficient to satisfy the Court.

LITLEDALE J.: It is clear that the statute 5 G. 4. c. 18. applies only to the case of penalties. The title and preamble both shew it. As to the other point, it is unnecessary to give a decision; but the information is that which gives the justices their jurisdiction, and that merely states that the wages were due to Willicombe "for labour as a carpenter." The evidence on the minute of petty sessions adds two things: that he was a journeyman carpenter, and at 14s. a week; and then the warrant improves upon that again, by stating the wages to have been due for work and labour "as a servant."

ON appeal against an order of justices, removing Nicholas Halvosso and his family from the borough of Penryn to the parish of Mabe, both in the county of Cornwall, the sessions confirmed the order, subject to the opinion of this Court upon the following case. By indenture duly executed, bearing date October 16th, 1799, and since lost, the pauper, then being about fifteen years of age, was expressed to be bound an apprentice, with the consent of his surviving parent, to Thomas Bolitho, of the parish of St. Gluvias, tanner, until he should

The language of stat. 37 G. 3. c. 111. s. 3., exempting from a certain duty any indenture of apprenticeship, "where a sum or value not exceeding 10*l.* shall be given or contracted with or in relation to the apprentice," did not apply to cases where no sum or value was given or contracted for.

should attain twenty-one. No sum of money or value was given or contracted for, with or in relation to the apprentice. The indenture was stamped with the several stamps impressed on indentures of that class, by the several statutes prior to stat. 37 G. 3. c. 111., amounting to 10s.: but the sessions, considering it liable under that act to an additional stamp duty of 10s., held that evidence of it ought not to be received; and they confirmed the order as above (a).

Bere, in support of the order of sessions. The indenture was not admissible. The statute 37 G. 3. c. 111. s. 1., imposes an additional stamp duty of 10s. on every deed made after the 1st of August 1797. Sect. 3. enacts, "That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend to any indenture of apprenticeship, where a sum or value not exceeding 10*l.* shall be given or contracted with or in relation to the apprentice." The question then is, whether the exemption applies when nothing is given. That case is unprovided for. It cannot be said here that a sum or value not exceeding 10*l.* is given. [Patteson J. The question is, whether no sum is a sum or value not exceeding 10*l.*] A sum or value not exceeding 10*l.*, given or contracted for. It may not have been meant that indentures, where nothing is given, should be exempted. The absence of any consideration is not a sure proof of the parties being poor; though a small consideration may indicate it. The Stamp Act, 55 G. 3. c. 184. Sched. Part I., tit. Apprenticeship, expressly provides for the case where there shall be no money or valuable consideration moving to the master or mistress, and limits the duty in such case to 1*l*. or 1*l*. 15*s*., according to the number of words (a); it having been perceived that the exemption clause in question here could not have the operation now contended for. In that part of the Schedule, Part I. to 55 G. 3. c. 184., which relates to leases, a particular duty is imposed on leases granted in consideration of a sum of money by way of fine, &c. "without any yearly rent, or with any yearly rent, under 20*l*." The words, "without any yearly rent," would have been unnecessary, if it had been understood that a lease without rent was comprehended under the words "with any yearly rent under 20*l*." Wood v. Norton (b) shews that the words of this Schedule are to be construed strictly, whatever may be urged as to the apparent intention of the legislature.

Crowder, contra. The true meaning of 87 G. 3. c. 111. s. 3. is, that the increase of duty shall not extend to any indenture, where a sum or value exceeding 10*l*. shall not be given or contracted for. According to the argument on the other side, the increased duty attaches if nothing be given; but not, if 10*l*. and no more be given. But the policy of the stamp acts is, to regulate the duty by the amount of the premium. This is a clause of exemption from a burthen imposed by preceding clauses: the Court, therefore, will favour a liberal

The stat. 44 G. 3. c. 98. repealed the duties granted by 37 G. 3. c. 111., and (Sched. A.) fixed the duties on indentures of apprenticeship as follows: — "Indenture of apprenticeship, where the sum or value given, paid, contracted, or agreed for, with or in relation to such apprentice shall not exceed 10*l*., 15*s*.;" "exceeding 10*l*., and not exceeding 20*l*., 1*l*. 10*s*." &c.

construction, if possible. It has been held that "and," in a statute, may be read "or" (a); the transposition of "not," here contended for, does less violence to the language, and prevents an absurd consequence, and one which would be against the intention of the legislature. In Wood v. Norton (b) the words of the statute were wholly without ambiguity, and were introduced to prevent frauds, which a loose construction might have favoured.

LORD DENMAN C. J. There is evidently a mistake in the act; but we have no power to correct mistakes or omissions of the legislature. Giving this clause the construction which we are obliged to put upon it, we must say that the exemption applies only to cases where there is a money contract, or value given or contracted for, within a certain amount. If the binding be altogether gratuitous, there is no exemption.

Held that, in a mandamus for this purpose, it was not necessary to state more fully the adoption of the act by the parish, and the due appointment of the auditors.

The statute enacts that the auditors “shall meet twice at

A mandamus issued calling upon a board to attend with, and produce to the auditors, their accounts, at such time and place, or at such times and places, as a majority of the auditors might appoint, and then and there give such information as to the accounts as they might be enabled to give, according to the directions of the act.

On return to such mandamus, and concilium obtained on the part of the Crown: Held, that the mandamus exceeded the authority given by the act; and that the Court could not in part enforce it, by a peremptory mandamus limited as to the place of meeting. And the Court quashed the mandamus.

The Court will, for the purposes of justice, mould the rule for a mandamus; but will not mould the writ itself, on application for a peremptory mandamus.

When a return to a mandamus is made, and a concilium obtained, the counsel objecting to the return must be heard first, though the opposite counsel take an objection to the form of the mandamus.

so to do. The writ then commanded the said trustees and the said clerk or clerks as follows: — "That you, or such of you as shall be thereto required, do attend with and produce to the auditors of accounts of the said parish of St. Pancras, acting under the said act of parliament passed in the second year of our reign, the book or books containing the account or accounts of all monies received and of all monies paid between Lady-day and Michaelmas-day 1883, by or on account of the said trustees under and by virtue of the said two first-mentioned acts of parliament, at such time and place, or at such times and places, as a majority of the said auditors may appoint and give notice thereof to the clerks of the said trustees, and then and there give such information as to the particulars of such accounts as you the said trustees and you the said clerk or clerks may be enabled to give according to the directions of the said act passed," &c., "or that you shew us cause to the contrary thereof." The writ was not obeyed, and a return was made, excusing the non-compliance. A concilium having been moved for, and the case set down in the Crown paper,

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, was now heard against the return (a).

Platt, contra, took four objections to the mandamus, of which two only are material here, as having been decided upon by the Court. First, the authority of the auditors does not sufficiently appear by the writ, which

(a) Platt, in support of the return, claimed to begin, inasmuch as he objected to the form of the mandamus. But, per Lord Denman C. J., If that reason were allowed, every one who supported a return would take an objection to the mandamus.

only recites that "the auditors, duly appointed and acting under and by virtue of" the act (1 & 2 W. 4. c. 60.), did summon and require the clerks to attend. It does not shew that the act was ever legally adopted by the parishioners. The first eight sections of the act state the proceedings to be taken for the purpose of adopting it in any parish, concluding with a notice of adoption; and sect. 10. enacts, "that in any parish in which public notice of the adoption of this act in the manner as aforesaid shall be so made and given, this act shall immediately become the law for electing vestrymen and auditors of accounts of the said parish in manner hereinafter mentioned." The mandamus passes over all these steps, and merely speaks of the auditors as "duly appointed." In Rex v. The Bishop of Oxford (a) the Court quashed a mandamus which called upon the bishop to license J. K. to be chaplain or curate of the church or chapel of P., alleging that he had been duly nominated and appointed by the inhabitants of the township of P., but not stating any consent of the rector, or any custom or endowment which might render such nomination effectual of itself. Lord Ellenborough there said, "the bishop is required by this writ to do an act, which he is alleged to have refused doing in breach of his duty. The writ then should state those facts which constituted his duty." [Patteson J. There it might have been true, as the writ alleged, that the curate was duly nominated and appointed by the inhabitants, and yet that would not have been sufficient to entitle him to the license]. Secondly, the thirty-fourth section of 1 & 2 W. 4. c. 60. enacts that the auditors shall meet twice a year at the board-room of the vestry, and (a majority of the auditors being present) shall proceed to audit the accounts of the vestry for the preceding half-year; and the vestry, by their clerk, shall produce before the auditors at every such meeting a true and just statement of account, &c.; the same power being given to the auditors as to the accounts of other boards having controul over any part of the parochial expenditure. But this mandamus does not recite that the clerks were summoned to attend such a meeting as is here described; and in the mandatory part it merely calls upon the trustees or clerks to attend with, and produce to the auditors, their books, at such time and place as a majority of the auditors may appoint and give notice of; not specifying the description of meeting, nor fixing the time or the place. As to sect. 35., the requisition stated to have been made upon the clerks does not appear to have been founded on it, nor is the other part of the mandamus adapted to it. The power given to the auditors by this act, over the trustees, is stricti juris, and ought to be exactly followed.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, contra. As to the first objection: this is not a motion for a mandamus to admit auditors. No question is depending as to their title. It cannot be said that, in a proceeding like this, where their character as auditors is only introduced incidentally, the writ must set out all the proceedings taken by the parish for adopting the act, and for appointing auditors properly qualified under sect. 33. There is no instance of a mandamus having been so framed. [Lord Denman C. J. We are all satisfied that the first objection is not good. It is enough here, that the auditors appear to have been appointed by virtue of the act to this office, which is notoriously a public one. Littledale J. I do not found my opinion on the word "duly." Then, secondly, sect. 34. is merely directory as to the place of meeting. If the auditors do not meet in the board-room no penalty is imposed, nor are their acts made void. And the place where they may determine to meet is the "board-room of the vestry" for that purpose. Sect. 35. mentions no room, but speaks only of attendance at any meeting or adjourned meeting. And when the writ calls upon the trustees to attend at such time and place as the auditors may appoint, that must be confined, in the interpretation, to such an attendance as might lawfully be required; to an attendance even at a particular board-room, if it could not legally be had elsewhere. [Lord Denman C. J. The words of the requisition extend to any place, even if out of the parish. You claim to appoint any time or place you think proper. Patteson J. Such as a majority of the auditors may appoint]. The writ adds, "according to the directions of the said act." [Lord Denman C. J. That is after the words "and then and there give such information as to the particulars of such accounts, as you may be enabled to give." Besides, the writ speaks of a place or places; the act mentions only one place]. Supposing that the writ is too general in this respect, it is not therefore bad altogether. A peremptory mandamus may be granted for so much as may lawfully be enforced.

Lord DENMAN C. J. It is quite clear that we cannot grant a peremptory mandamus calling on these parties to do what they are not obliged to do by law. The mandamus requires the trustees to do a particular act, that is, to attend with, and produce to the auditors, their accounts in any place and at any time that a majority of the auditors may think fit to appoint. The auditors had no power to make such a requisition. It may be that the power, if exercised, would not be abused, but we cannot call upon these parties to obey a demand made in terms which are contrary to the restriction of the statute. It is said that the generality of the demand is qualified by the words, "according to the directions of the said act;" but it cannot be so qualified by an expression which would require the parties to whom the writ is directed to look into an act of parliament. It is contended that the requisition of the writ may be partly good and partly bad, and that the valid part may be enforced: and it is true that, in Rex v. The Justices of Leicester (a), on a motion being made for a mandamus, requiring more than the Court thought fit to be demanded, a rule was granted in less comprehensive terms, adopting that part of the motion which the Court thought good. But here the thing which we are required to enforce is irregular. The Court said there, that they would mould the rule so as to meet the justice of the case. But here it is not a rule, but the writ itself, that is before us. We must enforce it in the terms in which it has issued, or not at all.

LITLEDAL J. The act 1 & 2 W. 4. c. 60. requires the auditors to meet at the board-room of the vestry. It is argued that this is merely directory: and in many cases enactments of this kind are so. But the vestry is the place where meetings of this kind ought to be held by law. The board-room is merely a convenient substitution for the vestry of the church, which is the regular place for parish meetings. Then the mandamus requires the trustees and clerks to attend and produce the accounts, at such time and place, or at such times and places, as a majority of the auditors may appoint, and then and there give such information as to the particulars of such accounts, as the said trustees and clerks may be enabled to give according to the directions of the said act. It is contended that the concluding words of this clause over-ride the whole, and, therefore, that nothing is required which is inconsistent with the act; but if the act limits the meetings to a particular place, the mandamus should do so too. It is said that the writ may be good in part and bad in part; but the requisition is to produce the accounts at such time and place or times and places as a majority of the auditors may appoint: and the whole depends upon that.

PATTESON J. The objection may seem at first sight a small one to prevail in such a case as this, but I am afraid of the principle which it is sought to introduce. If one thing only is directed by the mandamus, and that is against the act of parliament, it would be a dangerous precedent to grant a peremptory mandamus in the manner suggested. We should be remoulding the writ. We may mould the rule for a mandamus, but not the writ itself.

WILLIAMS J. I am of the same opinion. No part of the writ is severable from the rest.

The KING against The OUZE Bank

A statute directed that a sum of money should be paid to certain commissioners, who were therewith to execute all such works, &c. as should from time to time be deemed necessary, proper, or expedient for putting certain banks and bridges in a permanent state of stability and security, and for constructing the forelands and slopes of the banks, as far as practicable, upon one uniform system.

A MANDAMUS issued in Trinity term, 1834, directed to The Commissioners of The Ouze Banks, appointed and acting under stat. 1 & 2 W. 4. c. lxxiii. (Local and Personal, Public), intituled, "An act to alter, amend, and enlarge the powers of the several acts now in force relating to the new river or cut from Eau Brink to King's Lynn in the county of Norfolk, called The Eau Brink Cut; and to raise further funds for carrying the said acts into execution." The mandamus, in substance, set forth that it was by the said act (a) recited that, by reason of the defective state of the banks and bridges of the river Ouze, in parts described in the act, some injury had been occasioned to them by the increased velocity of the current in consequence of the improvement of the outfall of the river into the harbour of King's Lynn, for which it was just that compensation should be made from the funds of the commissioners of drainage acting under the authority of certain acts of parliament in the said act recited, and that (a), in order to put an end to the disputes and differences between the commissioners of drainage, acting under the authority of certain acts of parliament therein recited, and the owners of or persons liable to the maintenance of the banks of the said river Ouze, touching the injury of the said banks, it had been agreed that the commissioners of drainage should raise and pay a sum of money (the amount to be fixed as in the act directed) as a final compensation for the damage occasioned or to be occasioned to certain parts of the banks of the Ouze described in the act, by the altered course of the Ouze, or the execution of any works of the commissioners of drainage; and that 12,000*l.* had been fixed as the amount to be paid for past injuries to the banks, and 46,000*l.* to be laid out in putting the banks into one uniform system of repair. The mandamus then went on to state that the act directed the payment of the 46,000*l.* at certain specified times to the treasurer of certain persons, who by the act (b) were appointed commissioners to carry the act into execution so far as related to the repair and management of the said Ouze banks and bridges, to be designated "The Ouze Bank Commissioners;" and that it was by the said act further enacted (c), "that the said Ouze bank commissioners shall, and they are thereby authorised and required,

By mandamus, reciting this clause, and that the money had been paid to the commissioners, they were ordered to proceed to put the banks forthwith in a permanent state of stability and security, and to construct the forelands and slopes of the banks, as far as practicable, upon one uniform system.

Return, that the commissioners had from time to time, at all times from the passing of the act hitherto, proceeded to execute all such works "as should be, or were, from time to time deemed necessary, proper, or expedient for putting the banks in a permanent state of stability and security, and for constructing the forelands and slopes of the banks, as far as practicable, upon one uniform system."

Held an insufficient return, and a peremptory mandamus awarded.

The mandamus then stated that the 46,000*l.* had been paid to the Ouze bank commissioners, and that the commissioners of drainage and certain owners of land drained by the Ouze had applied to them to proceed to put the banks of the said river Ouze, &c. Sir W. W. Follett was now heard against the return. The first part of the return is insufficient. It is not enough to say, that the commissioners have done what has been deemed necessary. Deemed necessary by whom? The mandamus is to try whether their discretion has been honestly used. The return should state what has been done; and should also expressly allege allege that no more was necessary. Then a traverse might be taken, which now is impossible. [He then argued against the other part of the return, as to the extension of the waterways, &c. upon the construction of the local act.]

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, contra. The first part of the return follows the words of the act of parliament. The act vests a discretion in the commissioners; the return substantially alleges that they have exercised that discretion. If the mandamus, in fact, goes beyond the act, it is bad pro tanto; if not, then the return, which follows the act, must be good. The words "should be" are perhaps not intelligible; but, if so, they may be rejected. Or the word "or" may be construed copulatively, instead of disjunctively; and then the return means that all has been done which has been and will be deemed necessary. The return might be traversed by denying that all which is necessary has been done. [The argument as to the other part of the return is omitted.]

Biggs Andrews (in the absence of Sir W. W. Pollett), in reply. The argument, that the return need only follow the act, for that the mandamus ought not to go further, is, if of any force, an objection to the issuing of this mandamus; and that cannot now be made. But, besides, the return should at least go so far as to state whether, in fact, any, and what money has been expended upon the works. This Court should have the means of ascertaining whether the act has been complied with, which the return does not furnish.

Lord

LORD DENMAN C. J. This mandamus does not follow the precise terms of the act. (His Lordship then read the command in the writ.) I do not think it was requisite that the writ should use the words "such as shall be deemed necessary." The parties bringing the case before the Court had a right to assume that the things commanded to be done were necessary. If the return had stated that the commissioners thought such and such things necessary, and that they had done them, that would have been a sufficient answer. It might have been more satisfactory if they had shewn what they had done, and what they had spent: but I am disposed to think that it would have been enough if they had said that they had exercised their judgment, and done all they deemed necessary. But they have used unintelligible language, making an assertion in the alternative. No meaning can be given to the words "as should be or were from time to time deemed necessary." A party is not to return a nonsensical answer to the King's writ of mandamus, and leave the Court to interpret it. (His Lordship then stated that, upon the construction of the act, he considered the other part of the return bad.) The return seems to me bad in all its parts, and a peremptory mandamus must go.

LITLEDAL J. As to the first part of the return, it was open to the commissioners to return in two ways. First, they might have returned in so many words that they had done such works as were necessary, and that the banks were put into a state of permanent stability. This they have not returned; and perhaps, in the time which has elapsed, they have had no opportunity of doing such works. Secondly, they might have said, "We have from time to time executed divers matters and things for the purpose of putting the banks into perfect security, and are proceeding so to do." This they do not return. But they only return that they have done all such things "as should be, or were, from time to time deemed necessary," in the words of the act, without saying that they have done any thing. It seems to me that this is not sufficient. As to the disjunctive allegation (though I do not say that "or" may not sometimes be copulative), it seems to me that it is bad here.

PATTERSON J. I am of the same opinion. Possibly it might have been enough if the commissioners had returned that they had from time to time done all things necessary for putting the banks in a permanent state of repair: but I, for one, should have thought that not sufficient. The commissioners are appointed, and are intrusted with money, for a particular purpose; and I think they should shew that they have expended a part of the money in the works, and are proceeding with them. The Court does not, by the word "forthwith," mean to command them to do every thing instantly; but to set about the works directly, and do what they can. If they had done all they could, they should have said so: but this they do not say.

WILLIAMS J. I am entirely of the same opinion. What does the return mean? How much, or how little, has been done? To whose satisfaction? The allegation here made might have been satisfied if nothing had been done.

Peremptory mandamus awarded.

FLETCHER against LEW.Saturday,
June 6th.

A RULE nisi was obtained in this case, for a stay of proceedings until the plaintiff should give security for costs. The plaintiff was resident abroad, and had, on the 10th of April last, given a notice of action, in which he was described as of Nieuport in Belgium. He afterwards, May 12th, served the defendant with a copy of a writ of summons in an action of trespass, to which an appearance was entered on the 13th. The plaintiff delivered a declaration and rule to plead, May 23d, and a plea of not guilty was delivered May 27th. The defendant made the present application on the 30th, no copy of an issue having yet been served.

Platt now shewed cause. The application is too late, after plea pleaded. The defendant knew, even before the action was brought, where the plaintiff resided. A motion like the present must be made as early as possible after the defendant knows that the plaintiff is resident abroad. In Duncan v. Stint (a) it was held to be too late, where the plaintiff, having that knowledge, had pleaded.

Overseer of

LORD DENMAN C. J. Perhaps, if the agreement had been carried into effect, these unfortunate occurrences would not have taken place; and we may regret that the overseer has not exercised his discretion otherwise. But, before we grant a rule for a criminal information against a public officer for a neglect of duty, we must see that it is a duty which the law casts on him. I know of no law which prescribes that precautionary measures of this particular nature shall be taken by the overseer; nor, if he would take them, are the poor bound to submit to them. If the existence of the legal duty had been shewn, the facts on these affidavits would shew gross negligence; but I do not see the legal duty.

LITTTLEDALE J. This duty is not among those prescribed to overseers by acts of parliament; and I cannot see how it results from those which are prescribed. The paupers, or the parents of the paupers, might object to such a step being taken.

(with other trespasses not necessary to be mentioned, as they were not justified by the special pleas); and digging up and getting sand, &c. from and out of the said close, and carrying away and converting the said sand. The second count omitted some of the trespasses mentioned in the first. The third count was for taking away and converting the sand, &c.

there was a custom for all the inhabitants for the time being, occupying lands in E., to enter the close at seasonable times, and take therefrom reasonable quantities of all such sand as had so drifted, &c., for the purpose of manuring the lands in their occupation in the said county; and the defendant justified, as an inhabitant and occupier, &c.: Held, a bad plea; first, because the allegation of a custom was too vague; secondly, because the supposed custom was at all events void, inasmuch as the sand, when drifted upon a close, became part of it, and the claim therefore was to take a profit in alieno solo.

2. Issue being joined on a plea of prescription, pleaded to a declaration for trespass in G., if the plaintiff's witness be asked, in cross-examination, questions respecting the user in other places than G., and prove such user, the plaintiff in re-examination may shew an interruption of the user in such other places.

(justifying the trespasses mentioned in the introductory part of the plea). Replication, that the said George Simmons, and all those &c. from the time whereof &c., by himself, &c., have not dug and got, and have not been used &c., as to the said messuage and land, with the appurtenances, belonging and appertaining, in manner and form, &c. Similiter.

The third and fourth pleas were framed upon stat. 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71. sect. 1.; and justified, as to trespasses since November 2d, 1832, under an uninterrupted enjoyment (for sixty and thirty years respectively) in the defendant as occupier, and in the previous occupiers of a certain messuage &c., of the right to dig &c.; and issues were joined on the occupation.

Fifth plea, as to the trespasses pleaded to in the second plea. That the said George Simmons, before and at the said times when &c., was seised in his demesne as of fee of and in a certain other messuage and divers, to wit, 124 acres of other land, with the appurtenances, situate in the parish of St. Erme aforesaid, and that long before any of the said times when &c. and also before the passing of stat. 13 Eliz. S. to the defendant as aforesaid, and whose estate therein the said G. S. then had (allegation that the deed was lost, and profert could not be made), the date whereof was a certain day and year, &c. to wit, the day and year last above mentioned, the said dean and chapter did, for the several considerations therein mentioned and by them therein acknowledged to have been received, grant to the said Sir Richard Bevill, and to his heirs and assigns, for himself and themselves, owners, and occupiers, and his and their tenants and farmers, occupiers of the said last-mentioned messuage and land with the appurtenances, full licence, liberty, and privilege of digging and getting reasonable quantities of sand (as in the second plea, with demise from Simmons, entry of defendant, and possession till and after the times when &c.); by virtue of which said grant, and of the said demise so &c., the defendant, before and at the said times when &c., was and still is entitled to such licence, liberty, and privilege, as last aforesaid; and being so entitled, &c. Sixth plea, as to the same trespasses. That George Simmons was seised in his demesne as of fee of another messuage and other land, &c., situate in the parish of St. Erme aforesaid, and being so seised (demise to defendant by Simmons, entry of defendant, and possession till and at the times when &c.): and that heretofore, and long before the said times when &c., to wit, on

Seventh plea, as to the same trespasses. That the defendant, before and at the said times when &c., was, and from thence hitherto hath been, and still is, a liege subject of the Crown of England and an inhabitant of the county of Cornwall aforesaid, and an occupier of a certain other messuage and divers, to wit, 124 acres of other land, with the appurtenances, situate and being in the same county; and that heretofore, and long before the said times when &c., to wit, June 1st, A. Replication: That the said late King Henry III. by his certain letters patent sealed &c. did not grant &c. in manner and form &c. Similiter.

Eighth plea, as to the same trespasses. That the defendant before and at the times when &c. was, and from thence hitherto hath been and still is, an inhabitant of the parish of St. Erme in the county aforesaid, and a tenant and occupier of a certain other messuage and divers, to wit, 124 acres of other land with the appurtenances situate in the same parish, and that long before &c., to wit on the said 1st of June 1260, the said late sovereign lord Henry III. (seisin of Henry III., as in the preceeding plea, and grant of letters patent as before, with loss and excuse of profert, the grant being described as follows), the said late king did, after reciting, among other things, the

the great damage occasioned to the said several closes of and in which he was then so seised by the continual increase and drifting of the sea sand thereon, and that it had been represented to him that great benefit would accrue to the tenants and occupiers of messuages and lands within the parish of St. Erme in the said county, as well as great relief to the occupiers of the said several closes of and in which he was so seised, if the said tenants and occupiers of messuages and lands within the parish of St. Erme, from time to time, for ever thereafter, should have his royal licence and liberty to do as hereinafter next mentioned, grant to every person who then was, or thereafter should become and be, tenant, inhabitant, and occupier of any messuage and land with the appurtenances within the said parish of St. Erme in the county aforesaid, the liberty and privilege at all seasonable times of digging and getting reasonable quantities of sand from and out (among others) of the said close in which &c. in the said first count mentioned, and of taking and carrying away &c. (substantially as in the preceding plea, but stating that the sand was to be used upon the lands of the party in the said parish); by virtue of which said last-mentioned grant the defendant, so being such inhabitant of the said parish and occupier of the said last-mentioned messuage and land &c. (title and justification under the letters patent). Replication: That the said late King Henry III. by his certain other &c. did not grant to any person who was &c. in manner and form &c. habitant of the said county of Cornwall, and an occupier of a certain other messuage and divers, to wit, 124 acres of other land, with the appurtenances, situate and being in the same county; and that long before the said times when &c., to wit, June 1st, A. D. 1240, Richard Earl of Cornwall, being seised in his demesne as of fee of and in (amongst other things) the said close in which &c., by his certain deed poll (loss, and excuse of profert), the date whereof was a certain day &c., to wit, the day and year last aforesaid, did, for the considerations therein mentioned, grant to every person who then was, or thereafter should become and be tenant, inhabitant, and occupier of any messuage and land &c. (as in the seventh plea, mutatis mutandis). Replication: That the said Earl of Cornwall did not grant to any person &c., in manner and form &c. Similiter.

Tenth plea, as to the same trespasses. That the said close in which &c., before and at the said times when &c., was and still is contiguous and next adjoining to the sea shore, to wit, in the county aforesaid; and that the said sand in the first count mentioned was and is sand which had been and was from time to time, before any of the said times when &c., drifted and carried by and through the force and violence of the wind from and off the sea shore aforesaid, unto, into, and upon the said close in which &c., and there deposited and left. And that within the said parish of St. Erme, in the county aforesaid, there now is, and from time whereof &c. hath been, a certain ancient and laudable custom there used and approved of, (that is to say,) that all the inhabitants for the time being of the said parish, occupying messuages and lands situate within the said parish, have had, and have used and been

been accustomed to have, and of right ought &c., and still of right ought &c., the liberty and privilege of entering into and upon the said close in which &c., every year at all seasonable times of the year at his and their free will and pleasure, and of collecting, getting, taking, and carrying away from and out of the said close in which &c. reasonable quantities of all such sand as had been and was so drifted and carried unto, into, and upon the same, and there deposited and left, for the purpose of manuring the lands in the occupation of such inhabitants as last aforesaid, situate in the county aforesaid, doing no unnecessary damage thereby. And the defendant alleged that he, before and at the said times when &c., was, and from thence hitherto hath been and still is, an inhabitant of the said parish of St. Erme in the county aforesaid, and an occupier of a certain other messuage and divers, to wit, 124 acres of other land, with the appurtenances, situate and being in the same parish, to wit, in the county aforesaid, wherefore the defendant so being such inhabitant, &c., and occupier, &c. as aforesaid, on the said several days and times when &c., having occasion for such reasonable quantities of sand as last aforesaid, for the purpose of manuring his said last-mentioned land, and the same then and there requiring such manuring, at the said times when &c., being seasonable times of the year in that behalf, entered into the said close in which &c., in order to collect and get such reasonable quantities of sand as last aforesaid, and to take and carry away the same for the purpose of manuring his said last-mentioned land; and the defendant on those occasions (justifying the trespasses mentioned in the introductory part of the plea).

Replication : That within the parish of St. Erme aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, there now is not, nor from time whereof &c. hath been, a certain ancient and laudable custom, &c. (traversing the custom as set out in the plea). Similiter.

On the trial before Williams B., at the Cornwall Spring assizes 1834, it appeared that the plaintiff was occupier, by an underlease from a lessee of the dean and chapter of Exeter, of a farm called The Gear, of which the locus in quo was a part. In the locus in quo there were certain sand hills, forming part of a line of sand hills called towans, one or two miles long, passing through the defendant's farm and extending into the adjoining lands. The property of the several owners there is called their Rights, as The Gear Right, Jenkins's Right, &c. The towans are covered with rush, and form a rabbit warren: they also afford some pasture to sheep and cattle. Between them and the sea, at the distance of a third of a mile, is a cliff, under which is the beach. If the towans are broken up, the sand, becoming loose, blows away, and nothing remains but rock. The defendant's witnesses stated that, when the wind was strong from particular quarters, great quantities of fresh sand were blown upon the locus in quo and the adjoining lands, and that this was the sand taken by the parties claiming the privilege in question; and that such accumulations, by the wind, took place every year. The locus in quo was in the parish of Perranzabulo. The defendant was occupier of a farm called Trewaters, in the adjoining parish of St. Erme. The plaintiff proved that the defendant had taken the sand from the towans in The Gear Right, on the 29th of May 1832; previously, therefore, to the time which the justifications in the third and fourth pleas were confined.

1831.

 Trenchard.

A witness for the plaintiff, on cross-examination, said that he recollected the occupiers of Trewaters, and of many adjacent farms in the same and neighbouring parishes, taking sand both from The Gear Right, and from the Rights of other occupiers through whose lands the line of the towans passed; but whether the evidence as to the taking sand from the adjoining Rights was in answer to a question put on that point by the defendant's counsel, or was voluntarily added by the witness to his answer to a question respecting The Gear Right only, was disputed. The plaintiff's counsel, on re-examination, asked whether there had not been interruptions to the taking of sand from the adjoining Rights. This question was objected to; but the learned Judge permitted it to be put, on the ground that the evidence on cross-examination had opened the inquiry as to the adjoining Rights. The witness then mentioned acts of interruption on the adjoining Rights.

The evidence of the several witnesses shewed that sand had been taken, as far back as living memory went, from the locus in quo, not only by the occupiers of Trewaters, but by numerous occupiers in St. Erme and several other neighbouring parishes. No particular preference to the occupiers of Trewaters was shewn. No commencement of the right appeared, nor unity of possession of the locus in quo and the farms occupied by the persons taking the sand. The evidence in some instances went back for more than seventy years.

The learned Judge, in his charge to the jury, after pointing out that the issue on the first plea was proved by the plaintiff, and that the third and fourth pleas were inapplicable to the trespasses proved, told them that the meaning of the second plea was that the defendant, by reason of his being the occupier of a certain particular messuage, was entitled to get a reasonable quantity of sand for manuring his land: and he added that he presumed they would expect, in order to sustain a plea of that description, proof that a particular farm in the parish of St. Erme, which was in the occupation of the defendant, and belonging to his landlord Mr. Simmons, should have been more favoured than the rest, and that he had some symptom of a right peculiar to that farm exclusively. He then pointed out that the farmers in several adjoining parishes had indiscriminately claimed to get the sand; and added that, if the particular farm of the defendant was not clothed with a particular right beyond any other, the defendant's allegation in the second plea was not proved. As to the issue on the fifth plea, his Lordship asked the jury what evidence there was of the grant, or proof that such a person as Sir Richard Bevill had ever existed, or had been the owner of Trewaters; and he said that it was for the defendant to prove that in point of fact the grant was made. As to the issue on the sixth plea, his Lordship asked what evidence there was of the grant being made, and said that it was a thing not to be governed by imagination; that no evidence was given of the existence of John de Trewaters, and that one king might have made such a grant as well as another. As to the issues on the seventh and eighth pleas, his Lordship asked what evidence there was to establish, in the slightest degree, the existence of the letters patent, or to draw a line between Henry III. and any other king. As to the issue on the ninth plea, his Lordship asked what evidence there was to cause an inference that there ever was such a man as Richard Earl of Cornwall, or, supposing his existence, that he had made such a grant rather than any other person. As to the issue on the last plea, his Lordship said that the whole evidence bore on that, for that the defendant's messuage did not, upon the evidence, stand out as distinguished from the rest. The jury at first said that they found for the defendant on the second and tenth pleas, and for the plaintiff on the rest. His Lordship then asked if they found any right in the particular farm of the defendant; to which they replied, not independently of the custom, but in common with all the other farms and parishes; and, in answer to another question from the learned Judge, they said that they found no right in the particular farm of the defendant, beyond the general custom. The verdict was then given for the plaintiff on all the issues, except that on the tenth plea: and on that for the defendant.

In Easter term 1834 (April 18th), Follett obtained a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why there should not be judgment for the plaintiff, non obstante veredicto, with 1s. damages, on the tenth plea, or why the verdict obtained in the cause should not be set aside, and a verdict be entered for the plaintiff with 1s. damages; and, on the following day, Coleridge Serjt. obtained a rule nisi for a new trial in case the court should make the plaintiff's rule absolute, on the grounds of the admission of improper evidence, and of misdirection.

BLEWETT

Crowder and Butt, in this term (June 8th), shewed cause against the rule obtained by Follett. The tenth plea sets out a valid custom. It will be contended, on the authority of Gateward's Case (a), that the right here pleaded is matter of prescription, and cannot be the subject of custom, being a claim to take a profit in alieno solo. But it is material to consider in this case the nature of the thing taken, and the manner in which it becomes lodged upon the plaintiff's soil. [Littledale J. How is it possible to distinguish, for the purpose of establishing a custom, the sand which you allege to be drifted upon this close by the wind, from the sand which may be there independently of that cause, as constantly happens on closes near the sea?] The evidence on this trial shewed that there may be a case in which the drift sand can easily be distinguished. The coast is a peculiar one. And the taking of sea sand for manure on the coasts of Cornwall and Devon generally is a practice which has been recognised by statute, 7 Jac. 1. c. 18. [Lord Denman C. J. Not the taking of it from another's soil adjoining the sea-shore.] This is merely something which has accidentally lodged on the soil, and is not part of it or of its produce; as, for instance, grass eaten in right of common of pasture is. The sand is taken on the close, instead of being collected on the sea-shore, from which it came, and where it might have been taken without objection. It is as if parties claimed to go upon a close for the purpose of picking up sticks, or sea-weed. The two distinctions laid down in Gateward's Case (a) are, between "a charge in the soil of another and a discharge in his own soil," and "between an interest or profit to be taken or had in another's soil and an easement in another's soil." The Court will not extend those distinctions; and here no claim is made to a profit in the soil. The custom falls within the same rule with that of dancing (a), or that of playing at lawful games (b), on the soil of another, which are good, though it may be said that they are attended with some injury to the land. The objection which has been taken to claiming some rights of this kind by custom and not by prescription (Grimstead v. Marlowe (c)), viz. that, if claimed by custom, they cannot be released (as they may if annexed to the fee), appears somewhat refined. The real question is, whether the thing claimed be or be not a profit à prendre in the soil. Here the right asserted is merely that of following a chattel; it is as much an easement as a right of way, or the rights of exercise or amusement already referred to. In Stile v. Butts (d) a custom for every tenant and inhabitant in Brookbank to dig, have, and carry away clay in Brookbank Green was pleaded, and no objection taken to the custom. A custom to turn the plough upon headland has been held a good justification of trespass and subversion of soil in the adjoining land for the purpose of turning the plough; 7 Vin. Abr. p. 174. tit. Custom (P), pl. 4. (e): that is a stronger case than the present. In The Bishop of Lincoln v. Atwood, cited 7 Vin. Abr. p. 176. tit. Custom (P), pl. 14., a custom for the meadow-reeve to have, for his pains in collecting the bishop's rents, a cartload of hay out of the meadow in quo &c., seems to have been allowed a good one. In the same volume, p. 179. tit. Customs (C.), pl. 10. p. 180., a case is cited, where a custom that if hogs came into the street they should be taken and killed and carried to the hospital for sustenance of the poor there, was allowed good, "though contrary to equity." That was a more objectionable custom than the present. The customs "when a man hath agisted his cattle in my park, in the time of a great snow, for necessity to cut the branches of the oaks for them," 7 Vin. Abr. p. 182. tit. Customs (E.), pl. 12.; "to dry nets upon the land of another man," ibid. p. 183. tit. Customs (F.), pl. 2.; and "for those that govern the common to enclose to their proper use," ibid. p. 186, tit. Customs, (G.) pl. 7.: have all been held good. In 7 Vin. Abr. p. 179. tit. Customs (C.), pl. 4., it is said that there "are many cases of customs allowed for particular reasons in particular places, which if they were general would be contrary to law and common equity, and this in lands, goods, and liberties," which customs are allowed on reasons "not now disputable." And it is again laid down, shortly afterwards, that customs have become established ratione loci, which are not allowed throughout England: 7 Vin. Abr. p. 187. tit. Customs (H.), pl. 10. in marg., where "the custom of the Isle of Man to hang for stealing a capon, but not an ox," is referred to. fifteenth to the lord of the soil, is a stronger instance of a right exercised by local custom than the present. The render to the lord, there, of some part of the thing taken, makes no essential difference. The matters of easement claimable by the inhabitants of a district, in the soil of an individual, first, for the enjoyment of their estates, and, secondly, for the public good, are enumerated in the argument of counsel against the customs set up in Fitch v. Rawling (a); among them is the right "to water cattle at a certain watering-place:" and such a custom appears to be recognised in Pain v. Patrick (b); yet the water is more strictly the property of the individual over whose soil it flows, than the sand is that of the person upon whose land it has drifted. In Selby v. Robinson (c) a custom to break off, gather, and carry away the rotten wood of the branches of trees growing in a chase, for fuel, was held bad; but that was because the persons claiming were too vaguely described, and the case differed from this, inasmuch as the thing to be taken was part of the permanent produce of the soil. In Oxenden v. Palmer (d) a custom was pleaded, for all persons residing in a parish, whose duty required them to amend the highways within the parish, to dig up and carry away stones and shingle from the plaintiff's close, being part of the waste land between high and low water mark; and no question was there made, whether or not such a custom was valid in law. There is no authority, and there appears no reason, for saying that the privilege here in question may not be claimed as well by custom as by prescription; it is as easily defined in the one case as the other, and not more injurious to the land-owner the plea limits the custom to a reasonable quantity and seasonable times: and a distinct line is drawn as to the persons entitled. [Littledale J., in the course of this argument, enquired if there were any case in which the inhabitants of one parish had established a custom to take a thing in another.]

Sir W. W. Follett, contra. The argument on the other side assumes that the inhabitants have a right to take the sand on the sea-shore. But that shore is the soil of an individual, as well as any other close, and there cannot be a custom to take the sand from it. If raised by the wind, the sand still belongs to the owner of the sea-shore. It is true that there is a legal right of getting sand for manure on the coast of Cornwall, but that is a right given by statute (7 Jac. 1. c. 18.), and limited thereby to the space below high-water mark. Many of the estates on this coast are bordered by sand-hills, which are merely the accumulation of the sand blown up by the wind in the manner stated on the trial. The sand-hills, when bound by the rushes growing on them, are a defence against the sea, and afford pasture; and the loosening of those hills, by destroying the rush or otherwise, is a serious mischief. The manner in which this happens is very fully stated in the recital of stat. 15 G. 2. c. 33. s. 6., which forbids the cutting of bent from such sand-hills on the north-west coasts of England. Now the plea states that the sand in the first count mentioned was sand which had been and was "from time to time before any of the said times when &c." drifted by the wind from the sea-shore "unto, into, and upon the said close in which &c., and there deposited and and left;" and it asserts a right in the inhabitants to enter the close and take away reasonable quantities "of all such sand as had been and was so drifted and carried unto, into, and upon the same, and there deposited and left." There is, therefore, a privilege claimed of taking any sand, without limit, which may at any time, no matter how long since, have been drifted on the coast. The same pretention might be set up as to every field in that part of the county. If they may take one portion of the sand, they make take the whole; all the neighbouring soil has originally come by drifting; or, if not, no one can distinguish, after a time, what part of it has r has not so originated. The vagueness alone would make such an allegation of custom inadmissible. As to the validity of customs, the rule is, not merely that a custom to take part of the soil is bad, but that there cannot be a custom to take a profit from the soil. Such a right may be prescribed for in a que estate: but a prescriptive claim may be released and got rid of; a custom cannot. The cases cited from Viner's Abridgment cannot all be sustained, if it is to be supposed that in each of them the distinction between a custom and a prescription is kept sight of. But it is evident that in some instances the two are spoken of promiscuously. The custom, as it is termed, that a man, having agisted his cattle in a park, shall, in time of a great snow, for necessity, cut the branches of the oaks for them, is an example of this; a privilege so claimed could not be the subject of a custom. It may be laid down generally, that there cannot be a valid custom to do an injury to another's soil, or take a profit in it. A custom to hang nets may be good; but a case is cited in 7 Vin. Abr. p. 178.

tit. Customs (C.), pl. 2., where a custom for all the men of Kent, when they fish in the sea, to dig in the land adjoining, and pitch stakes to hang their nets to dry, was held bad, as "contrary to common right and reason." (He was then stopped by the Court.)

LORD DENMAN C. J. It is clear that this cannot be a good custom. The sand, the article claimed, is a part of the soil, and inseparable from it. And, if there were a distinction capable of being ascertained, there must surely be a limitation of the alleged right, as to time. It cannot be said that the inhabitants may take the sand which has drifted, at any distance of time; that would place the whole soil at the mercy of any person claiming under the custom. There is no necessity for entering into the particular instances which have been referred to in argument.

LITLEDALE J. The right as here claimed is at any rate attended with great uncertainty. It would apply to many places which are not separated from the sea-shore by hedges, and where all the soil has been thrown up from the sea-shore; and in such cases the custom, as alleged, might go the length of taking the whole away. But, independently of this, sand, even if blown into an enclosed field of grass or corn, becomes soil. Of what is soil in general composed? Many things enter into it which are brought artificially or by accident, and the moment they are so brought they become part of the soil. The inhabitants themselves, in this case, allege that they carry away the sand to manure their lands; by using it as such manure they would make it part of their own soil; and thus they claim, by their treatment, to make it soil, or no soil, as they think proper. This plea is an attempt to get rid of the necessity of stating a prescription and the facts necessary to support a prescriptive claim, by alleging a custom for the occupiers of tenements within the parish to do something within the close, each for the benefit of his particular tenement. I think the plea cannot be supported.

PATTERSON J. It is clear that there cannot be a custom to take a profit in alieno solo. This evidently is a profit, since the parties take the sand to manure their own lands. Then is it not in alieno solo? That is denied, because it is contended that the taking is not in the soil. But the claim is clearly to take a part of the ground; whether sand be blown in, or mud lodged, it is part of the close when once upon the land. A distinction may be attempted between the sand lately drifted, and the other soil of the close; and, where the sand forms a considerable mound, it may be easy to say that the upper part is drifted; but if that part were removed, and the lower arrived at, it would be impossible to distinguish. I am, however, of opinion that when any thing in the nature of soil is blown or lodged upon a man's close, it is part of the close, and he has a right to it against all the world. This therefore was a claim of profit to be taken in alieno solo.

WILLIAMS J. I am of the same opinion. The custom alleged is uncertain, indefinite, and absurd. In point of fact there can be no rule for ascertaining, in a case like this, what is sand blown from the sea-shore, and what is the original soil. And, in law, I do not see how there could be any such custom as this.
and

Rule absolute for judgment non obstante veredicto.

Sir W. W. Follett, on a subsequent day of this term (a), shewed cause against the rule for a new trial. First, the direction to the jury, that proof of a general custom would not sustain proof of the prescription, was accurate. The learned Judge did not tell the jury, that the prescription could not exist in right of one estate, if it also existed in right of several others; but that a proof of a general custom could not be proof of the prescription: and this was correct. The attempt, on the part of the defendant, was to turn a bad custom (as this is now decided to be by the judgment on the tenth plea) into a good prescription. The evidence shewed a general custom; there was nothing to connect it with the estate of George Simmons; the custom no more proved a prescription, than a prescription would prove a custom. In a case at nisi prius, in Cornwall, before Patteson J., that learned judge held, that a private and public way could not co-exist. Secondly, the direction as to the issues joined on the pleas of non-existing grants was substantially correct. No evidence of such grants existed: the generality of the usage was incompatible with its originating in a grant to the occupier of the particular farm. It was impossible for a jury to refer such a usage to the grant alleged to have been made by the dean and chapter, or by the Crown, or by the Earl of Cornwall, unless further evidence had been given, pointing to some particular time, place, or person. One step in such further evidence would have been to shew the existence, for example, of John De Trewaters: and so as to the other suggestions made by the learned Judge. In Livett v. Wilson (a), a non-existing grant of a right of way was pleaded and traversed; the only evidence was a user, as to which the proof was doubtful; and the judge having left to the jury, whether there had been an exercise of the right by virtue of a lost deed, and the jury having negatived it, the finding was supported. Here the evidence no more shewed a grant to the owner of Trewaters than to any other person. Thirdly, the evidence of interruptions on lands adjoining The Gear Right was properly admitted. The defendant, in cross-examination, had obtained the fact that the usage contended for by him had prevailed on a part of the towans not comprehended in The Gear Right, and the plaintiff of course was entitled to meet that fact by shewing that the usage had not been acquiesced in. But, even if this evidence were not admissible, its reception could be no ground for a new trial. The only effect of it was to weaken the evidence, not of the right upon the locus in quo, nor of that in respect of Trewaters, but of the general usage: but the jury found in favour of the general usage, and therefore against the evidence to which the objection is made. But, further, it is evidence which the plaintiff was entitled to introduce in chief, to meet the claim as to the locus in quo, in respect of Trewaters; for it appears that the towans constitute a line of sand-hills of the same kind, a part being in the locus in quo: this species of property is the same throughout, though in different hands. The case falls therefore within the principle of Stanley v.

White (a). In Tyrwhitt v. Wynne (b), evidence of reservations of mines in one part of a waste was held not admissible to support a plea, in trespass quare clausum fregit, of soil and freehold in another part of the same waste; but the judgment of Abbott C. J. proceeded upon the principle that the evidence, even if admitted, could have been of no importance to the verdict: and it is clear that the right to the minerals could not affect the question of right to the surface. Here the verdict was against the party giving the evidence which is questioned.

Crowder and Butt contra. First, the direction was wrong as to the plea of prescription. It is not necessary, in order to shew a prescriptive right, that no other party should have done the act justified under the right. The evidence in fact shewed that the former holder of Trewaters, and all previous holders, for more than seventy years, had exercised the right. That is not met by shewing a right, or a practice, in others. Those others might also have a prescriptive right or rights, or they might claim a right under some custom. And such a custom would not be inconsistent with the defendant's prescription. The custom is now decided to be bad; but the plaintiff is not entitled to meet evidence of a legal prescription by proofs of a claim made by others to such an illegal custom. If a legal and an illegal claim exist, the act should, if possible, be referred to the legal claim. [Patteson J. Here are two issues, one on the custom, one on the prescription. Evidence being given, the judge must tell the jury to which issue it applies.] There might be a right by prescription in the owner of Trewaters as such, and also a right in the same person by custom as occupier of land in St. Erme, if the custom were legal. The evidence might prove both. But it was put to the jury as if the proof of the custom negatived the prescription. And, even if the prescription and custom were inconsistent, the defendant might apply the evidence to the prescription. Otherwise the proof of a prescriptive right of common will become almost impossible. Secondly, as to the direction respecting the issues on the lost grants. [Patteson J. Was there any evidence as to the commencement of the right?] There was not. [Patteson J. Then the evidence would prove a prescription, if any thing. The non-existing grants may be left out of the question.] They would be applicable, in case a unity of seisin were shewn. [Littledale J. I doubt whether the 7th, 8th, and 9th pleas be not objectionable on the same ground as the 10th.] The present question is, whether the evidence supported them; and whether it supported the 5th and 6th pleas. There was good evidence on all. The learned Judge pressed upon the jury that there was no proof that such a man as Sir Richard Bevill ever lived. But his seisin was admitted by the traverse of the grant; Cowlishaw v. Cheslyn (a), where evidence offered to disprove the seisin was held inadmissible. [Lord Denman C. J. I do not think that that case was much considered.] It goes much farther than the present. In Stott v. Stott (b) it was laid down that seisin could not be disputed on a similar issue. For the same reason, it should not have been put to the jury, whether they believed that Henry III. or Richard Earl of Cornwall granted. The only question open was, whether a valid grant could be presumed; if so, there could, on these pleadings, be no question as to the person granting. And the want of direct proof of the letters patent was put too strongly. The jury should have been told to explain the user, either by a lost grant, or a prescription, according to their discretion; and the evidence should have been applied to each of the 2d, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th pleas. Livett v. Wilson (a) differed essentially from this case. The evidence as to user there was conflicting, which circumstance took the case out of the general rule. It is true that, in Doe dem. Fenwick v. Reed (b), Lord Tenterden said that presumptions of grants and conveyances had gone to too great length; and it was held that a jury must believe in the actual existence of a deed: but there the possession, which was shewn in order to raise the presumption of the deed, might, on the facts proved, be legally accounted for upon another supposition, and that is the ground upon which the judges proceeded (c). There is no greater objection to presuming a lost grant from user than there is to inferring a prescription, which always implies a grant. [Williams J. No particular person is specified in laying a prescription.] But the grantor's seisin is admitted here. Thirdly, as to the admissibility of the evidence. The defendant's case, in support of the prescription, was simply that the user existed in the locus in quo;

(a) 8 Bing. 115. S. C. 10 B. Moore, 439. (b) 5 B. & Ald. 232.

(c) Holroyd J. distinguished the case from a right of way; and Bayley J., at Nisi Prius, told the jury that the loss of a grant of right of way was more probable than that of a conveyance.

but

but the witness, on cross-examination, being asked as to this user, chose to add that as to which no question was asked, namely, that it existed elsewhere. This has not the character of evidence given by the defendant; and the plaintiff was therefore not entitled, in re-examination, to shew the interruptions of the user elsewhere. [Williams J. I am perfectly satisfied that the evidence, as to the user elsewhere, came out in answer to questions from the defendant's counsel.] But not to questions respecting the user elsewhere. As to the argument, that in fact the custom was found in favour of the defendant, it is plain that the evidence of any interruption was likely to prejudice the other parts of his case.

BLEWETT

Lord DENMAN C. J. (After stating the pleadings.) The questions are, whether the evidence was properly received, and whether the jury were misdirected. The nature of this record must have made it very difficult for a judge to deal with it, so as to avoid introducing expressions not technically and strictly correct. I am not, however, prepared to say that in fact any thing incorrect was said. As to the evidence, it was shewn that persons not proprietors of the defendant's farm had taken sand in places besides the locus in quo. On looking at the report of the evidence, it is clear that this proof came out on the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness. But it is suggested that this was thrown in voluntarily by the witness, and that therefore the defendant is not bound by it as his own evidence. It did, however, come in, and the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to pursue it, unless the defendant got it struck out; and that was not done. The re-examination, therefore, might properly take place as it did. And, indeed, it seems rather more probable that the evidence was given in answer to a question from the defendant's counsel than otherwise; although that is a fact not agreed upon at the bar. The next objection is, that there was a misdirection in telling the jury that evidence of exclusive enjoyment was requisite; and the language objected to was, "that the farm of the defendant should have been more favoured" than the rest, and expressions to a similar effect. Now supposing that to be put to the jury by way of stating that there were two issues, one on the prescription, and one on the custom, and desiring them to say which they inferred from the evidence, there would be no misdirection, except on the supposition that in law there could be, at the same time, both a prescription and a custom in respect of the same land. If there could, the question should not have been put in the alternative. On that point we entertain doubts, and will take time to consider. The other objection relates to what was laid down respecting the pleas of lost grants. I think it sufficient on this point to observe that, if there was evidence of any one of the alleged grants, there was evidence of all. The jury might infer one as much the other. That, therefore, makes an end of the question; for, that being so, there can really have been no evidence to support any one. Without inquiring how far the record estopped the plaintiff, there was no evidence to point the user to any one grant in preference, and, therefore, clearly no evidence for any. As, therefore, the defendant could not possibly entitle himself to the verdict on those pleas, it is immaterial whether the language of the learned Judge was more or less strong.

LITTLEDALE

LITLEDALE J. As to the evidence, the proof respecting the adjoining land was brought out upon the defendant's cross examination. If the witness threw that in voluntarily, the defendant might have had it expunged from the judge's notes. As to the expression, that this farm should have been shewn to be particularly favoured, I do not say that such evidence is essential to the proof of a prescriptive right: it is material only for the purpose of shewing whether the user resulted from prescription or custom. If prescription and custom can exist together, the question should not have been left in the alternative. As to the observations made by the learned Judge on the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th pleas, it is said that the want of evidence as to the existence of Sir Richard Bevil or John De Trewaters should not have been put to the jury, because the plaintiff was estopped by the admissions on the record. Now, as to pleas of this kind, which have arisen in one's own memory, no one ever heard of grantors being introduced on the stage unless they had actually existed. Whether their existence must be proved is a point that has never arisen. Suppose the plea had been that the dean and chapter of Hampstead in Middlesex were seised in fee of the locus in quo, and that John Duke of Westminster was seised in fee of the defendant's estate, the defendant's argument would be, that we must take the existence of such personages for granted. Now as to these pleas, I think this general answer may be given: — that if the evidence establishes an user as far back as memory goes, and there does not appear to have been any time at which it did not exist, that is proof of a prescription: and, supposing the evidence sufficiently strong, a prescription is what the jury would find; and they have no right to find a grant, unless more be shewn. Supposing the evidence in such a case to leave it doubtful whether the right existed sixty or seventy years ago, it may be protected under the plea of a non-existing grant; but, if the evidence of user goes far enough to prove a prescription, such evidence cannot be relied on to prove a grant. The learned Judge, therefore, was right in telling the jury that there was no evidence of the grants. The same remarks apply to the pleas of grants to the inhabitants as of grants to an individual.

PATTESON J. With respect to the question, whether the evidence was improperly admitted, I confess that I felt considerable doubt till I heard the state of the case at the time when it was admitted. No name is given to the close in the declaration, so that there was nothing to draw the Judge's attention to the fact that it was called The Gear Right; and the learned Judge says that, in fact, he had, at that time, no notion that this was the distinctive name of the close, but thought that the name designated some extensive district. Had it appeared that the cross-examination of the defendant went only to shew that other persons exercised the right on this close, I should have thought the evidence in question was not let in. But, when it was left on the Judge's notes that the user had been in other places, that, however it got upon the notes, let in the re-examination. If it arose from the voluntary evidence of the witness, it should have been expunged; for an adverse witness cannot let in evidence against a party, on cross-examination by him, which he could not give in chief: but here I must take it that the defendant, in some way or other, let in the evidence in cross-examination: no fault, therefore, therefore, was committed in receiving the evidence on re-examination. Sir William Follett urges that, even supposing the admission to have been improper, no harm was done; and it does appear that the defendant was not, in fact, prejudiced. What the consequence of that would be, I will not say. As to the pleas of non-existing grants, I wish to give no opinion whether the onus probandi of the existence of the persons is thrown on the party pleading: for I throw these pleas out of the question. If there was proof of any private right in the defendant, it was a proof of a prescription. No commencement of the right was shewn. Where that is so, the evidence is held to prove a prescription, not a grant: to prove a grant, it should at least be shewn that the usage commenced about the time stated. No one can say which grant was proved of all those pleaded. It is, therefore, immaterial to consider whether the expressions of the learned Judge were strictly warranted or not: on that I wish to give no opinion. The third question depends upon this, whether private prescription and customary right can exist together. If they could not, and the evidence must necessarily be applied to one or the other, the direction was substantially correct; for, though a faulty expression may occur in a long summing up, the summings up of Judges are not scrutinized so minutely as to make that of importance. Therefore, as to the phrases "favoured" and "exclusive," in one sense a prescriptive right is exclusive: it is not common to all mankind: we are not bound to interpret it to mean that others cannot have it: so the word "favoured" was to point out to the jury that they must be satisfied that the occupiers of the farm enjoyed the privilege, because they were occupiers, and that the right was attached to the farm. I can see no fault, therefore, in the charge, on the supposition that the prescription and custom cannot co-exist. As to that, we will take time to consider. No case has been cited to shew that they can co-exist: I should like to hear whether there be any such. I hope the case in Cornwall, alluded to by Sir William Follett, will not be considered an authority. The opinion which I then expressed was on the sudden, at Nisi Prius; and, on reflection, I am by no means disposed to say that a private right of way may not exist together with a public right of road (a). But that would be a question on the evidence. If there were no evidence except of user by all persons indiscriminately, I should say there was only evidence of a public right of road: if there was only user by an owner of a particular farm, then I should infer a prescription.

WILLIAMS J. The pleas on the record placed my mind in uncertainty: for it appeared to me that, so far as the evidence was in favour of the custom, it was against the prescription. How far there was any fault in the pleas, or otherwise, I cannot say. I left it to the jury that, if they thought the getting the sand was referable to the custom, without reference to the particular farm, there was no evidence of prescriptive right. Certain expressions in my summing up remind me how far I was attempting to explain to the jury the distinction between a prescriptive right attached to a particular farm, and a general custom: especially the expression as to the defendant's messuage standing out as distinguished from the rest. So the words "exclusive" and "favoured" were used to bring the attention of the jury to the point, whether the right was particular or general; for instance, if a man set up a right of common attached to tenement A., a usage in respect of tenements B., C., D., &c. proves nothing. With respect to my having pressed upon the jury that there was no proof of the existence of the persons named in the pleas of non-existing grants, that proceeded from my not being able to see what was to satisfy them whether one person had granted rather than another. How could it be said that there was evidence of any particular grant, when the proof applied equally to all?

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J., on a subsequent day of the term (June 16th), delivered the judgment of the Court.

This case, when last argued, was considered to be in the same position as if there had been only two pleas of justification: one under a prescription to take sand upon the plaintiff's close; the other under a custom; and as if my learned brother who tried the cause had told the jury that they were to consider which, if either, of these pleas was proved, for that they could not find both in the affirmative. We desired time to consider whether this proposition of law was correct: but, upon reflection, it appears to me that this was not the question, but that the ruling must be taken with this qualification, viz. that they could not find both these things upon the particular evidence laid before them, but must decide which of the two they thought it proved.

Whether a prescriptive and a customary right to the same privilege can by possibility exist in respect of the same land, if each be distinctly proved by proper evidence applicable to each, is an abstract question which we need not determine. On looking back to the statement made at the time of moving for a new trial, we find reason to doubt whether the learned Judge did so submit it to the jury; for he was ready to receive their verdict on the second plea, affirming the prescriptive right, if they had chosen to persevere in it. But the ruling, if it had been in those terms, must be taken with reference to the fact, that the same evidence was offered in support of both the issues. It was evidence of enjoyment only, by which the party pleading his right undertook to prove it. But it would be inconsistent with common sense to say, that the very same facts could prove two rights of a completely different nature, such as that of one taking sand by prescription to himself and his ancestors alone in respect of particular lands, and to himself in common with his brother farmers in respect of all lands in the parish in respect of which the prescription is claimed, and also to himself and all the inhabitants of the county. It was manifestly necessary that the jury should make that election among inconsistent rights which the evidence should appear to them to establish. We think, therefore, that the question was properly submitted, and the direction right.

Rule for a new trial discharged.

TRESPASS for seizing and distraining the plaintiff's cattle, and converting, &c. Plea, not guilty. On the trial before Bosanquet J. at the Exeter Spring assizes 1834, the following facts appeared. The plaintiff was one of the overseers of the parish of Ashburton, for the year ending Lady-day 1832. The accounts for that year were allowed by two magistrates, Mr. Drake and Mr. Kitson. Subsequently, upon complaint before two other magistrates (a), Mr. Lane and Mr. Monro, that the plaintiff had not paid over the balance in his hands to the succeeding officers, a warrant was issued, directed to Luscombe, who was one of the four overseers of the succeeding year, and to the other three overseers, under the hands and seals of the latter magistrates, adjudging that, on examining and stating the accounts, 31*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* was remaining in the plaintiff's hands, and that he neglected and refused to deliver it over to the overseers of the present year, and requiring the four overseers, or one of them, to levy the sum by distress upon the plaintiff's goods. This warrant was delivered to one of the overseers, who nevertheless distrained. An action of trespass being brought against him,

Held, that the justices had no power to suspend the order on account of a doubt as to the correctness of the balance; that the defendant, therefore, was acting under a legal warrant, and was entitled to a demand of a copy of the warrant, under stat. 24 G. 2. c. 44. s. 6.

Quære, whether the justices who issued the warrant could have suspended it under any circumstances, as, for instance, upon discovering that the balance had been paid before the warrant was signed.

(a) It appears to have been assumed, in the judgment, that the justices who allowed the accounts were the same as those who signed the warrant and order of suspension; and this is, therefore, so stated in the marginal abstract.

Two justices allowed the accounts of overseers going out of office. By a subsequent warrant, reciting that on the accounts a certain balance appeared to be in the hands of one of the overseers, which he had neglected and refused to pay, they required the succeeding overseers to distrain for the balance on his goods, under stat. 50 G. 3. c. 49. s. 1. Afterwards, a doubt being raised whether the balance was correctly ascertained, they signed an order to the overseers to suspend, and not execute, the warrant of distress. This dated 30th October 1832. Some doubt having afterwards arisen whether the balance had been correctly ascertained, Mr. Monro signed an order, directed "to the churchwardens, constable, and overseers of the parish of Ashburton," and stating that the undersigned justices did order and command them to suspend, and not put in execution, the said warrant. This order was dated 19th February 1833. After Mr. Monro had signed this, he sent it to Mr. Lane, who signed it and sent it back to Mr. Monro. The order was not sealed. Mr. Lane stated at the trial that he had had no previous conversation with Mr. Monro about rescinding the warrant, and that he did not recollect having seen him between the signing of the warrant and receiving the order of suspension. The order was shortly after served on Luscombe by the magistrates' clerk. Luscombe afterwards, in March 1833, with the assistance of the other two defendants, distrained the goods in question. No proof having been given of any demand of a copy of the distress warrant, the defendant's counsel contended that the plaintiff must be nonsuited, under stat. 24 G. 2. c. 44. s. 6. It was answered, that the magistrates had a right to suspend the warrant, and that, while it was so suspended, the defendants were not acting under it, and, therefore, that they were not entitled to a demand of a copy. The learned Judge reserved the point, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff. In Easter term 1834, Bompas Serjt. obtained a rule nisi for a nonsuit.

Sir W. W. Follett now shewed cause. The magistrates, on discovering a mistake, and finding reason to believe that the plaintiff was not in arrear, had power to to suspend their previous order; and the order of suspension was signed by the magistrates who made the first order. The defendant had notice of the suspension before the distress was made. As to the general question of the power to suspend, a magistrate cannot be irretrievably bound by merely having put his name to a warrant. On discovering that a party against whom a warrant has issued is not liable to the charge, he may direct the constable, who is merely his servant, not to act on the warrant. An order of removal may be superseded, before it is executed, in a case of surprise, Pancras v. Rumbald (a); or it may be superseded after execution, Rex v. The Justices of Norfolk (b). [Patteson J. That was by agreement of the parties. So a Judge who has signed the order for the execution of a convict may respite him; and this Court may stay the execution of its own judgments. And this is a beneficial power. Such a power may be exercised at any place or time before the execution of the original order, as in the case of a respite; the principle being that the officer, whose only authority is the order of the judge or magistrates, cannot act while that order is suspended. The overseer here is merely a ministerial officer; his authority is revocable by the party conferring it, as that of a commissioner of bankruptcy is revocable by the great seal. There can be no necessity that the magistrates should meet, if they concur in suspending their own order. One of several judges acting under a special commission might, if he felt doubts as to the propriety of a conviction, communicate his doubt to the other commissioners, and they might concur in a respite without meeting. Suppose magistrates issued a warrant to take goods, and afterwards discovered that they had no jurisdiction, and countermanded the order, and the party having the warrant chose still to execute, it is clear that the owner of the goods must have a remedy; yet he could have no remedy against the magistrates who had countermanded: the person executing the warrant must, therefore, be liable. If a constable were indicted for not executing a warrant, would it not be a defence to shew that it was countermanded?

Bompas Serjt. (with whom was Crowder) contra. First, the magistrates had no power to suspend; secondly, if they had, this was not a regular exercise of such power; thirdly, the parties here, as they acted bonâ fide, were at any rate entitled to a demand of the warrant. First, the only instances in which an order has been held capable of suspension (independently of express enactment) have been where no third party had become interested, or where the proceeding was a criminal one. A Judge respites a criminal whom he has tried, not simply because he is in the commission, but because he is considered to represent the Crown, who is the party adverse to the prisoner. But it is very doubtful whether, if a third party became interested, as by escheat, the authority of the Judge by itself would be sufficient. A warrant to apprehend is a mere ex parte proceeding, in which no other party is interested; and, therefore, that case is reduced to the principle already referred to, of a

consent by all parties interested. But here the succeeding churchwardens and overseers are interested; and, even in the event of an appeal against a disallowance of accounts under stat. 50 G. 3. c. 49. s. 2., the appellant must, in the first instance, pay over to the succeeding officers the sum admitted by him to be due, and give recognisance to abide the order of sessions as to the rest. Besides, here the magistrates were not acting under their general power as justices of peace, but as arbitrators under the statute, and their decision had the effect of an irrevocable award. [Patteson J. I agree, if the suspension had the effect of re-opening the accounts; but the warrant proceeds, not merely on the settlement of the accounts, but also upon a neglect or refusal to pay.] The facts of the case shew that the object was merely to re-open the accounts. Secondly, the act of the magistrates must at any rate be joint. According to the argument on the other side, a single magistrate might in all cases protect himself against an action by his single revocation. Thirdly, the defendant, at any rate, was acting bonâ fide under the warrant (unless it was a nullity), and therefore was entitled to the benefit of stat. 24 G. 2. c. 44. s. 6., which was meant to protect officers who have innocently exceeded the strict limits of their authority. It is not necessary, for this purpose, that the warrant should be legal; Price v. Messenger (a). It is a fallacy to assume that the constable can be sued wherever the magistrate cannot: there is no general right of action in every case of an irregular proceeding, where the party acts bonâ fide. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

LORD DENMAN C. J. The very general way in which the argument was put on the plaintiff's side startled me. If the warrant was wholly invalid, and the magistrates gave notice of nullity to the officer before it was executed, more especially if the party interested had not then required him to execute it, possibly the officer, if sued, would not be entitled to a copy of the warrant. But that is not the present case; and it is not necessary for me to give any opinion on the more general doctrine. It appears that the question which arose here was, whether the accounts had originally been settled rightly by the magistrates. After that settlement the magistrates had no right to rescind their decision. The decision of the justices, and the order to pay the balance, were legal; and the magistrates could not afterwards entitle themselves to rescind by saying, "we now doubt as to the state of the accounts." The constable, therefore, was justified in acting on the warrant, and was not acting of his own wrong. The bona fides is not impugned; he acted on a warrant; and therefore the copy should have been demanded.

LITLEDALE J. By stat. 50 G. 3. c. 49. s. 1., the accounts are, in the first place, to be submitted to two or more justices, who are, if they think fit, to signify their allowance and approbation. After they have done this they are functi officio, and cannot open the accounts. Then, if the churchwardens and overseers, who have accounted, refuse to pay the arrearages which appear on the allowance of the account, two or more justices (not necessarily the same as those who allowed the accounts) may issue their warrant to the subsequent churchwardens and overseers to levy such arrearage.

Here

Here it is said that the justices who allowed the accounts had made a mistake. Be it so. Still they had no more right to make an alteration afterwards than an arbitrator has to alter his award. Their power was at an end. The parties, if dissatisfied, should have appealed under the second section. The justices were authorised to issue their warrant; and they have done so. They had no right to suspend on account of a supposed mistake. If it had appeared that they had made a wrong inference as to the fact of a refusal to pay, I will not say whether they might or might not have countermanded their warrant; but they had no right to examine the accounts again. On this ground, therefore, I am of opinion that the warrant remained in full force, and that there should have been a demand of the copy.

PATTESON J. The doubt on my mind all along has been as to the general question, whether the warrant could in any case be revoked, upon its being discovered that it had issued improperly. I do not say whether it could or not: no authority goes the length of determining this point; and, if it were now necessary to enter into the general question, I should wish for more time to consider it. But here it is plain that the warrant was revoked with the view of reconsidering the state of the accounts, which the magistrates clearly had no power to do. The accounts had been rendered, had been the subject of discussion, and had been allowed. The act, after directing that two or more justices shall examine and allow, authorises any two or more justices to issue their warrant for levying the arrears in case of refusal to pay. Suppose the parties had gone to two other other justices, what right could these justices have had to enter into the question? But, for this purpose, the justices who issue the warrant are other than the justices who allow the accounts. If it had appeared that the warrant was issued on the notion that the money had not been paid, and that in fact it had been paid, that would have raised the general question, on which I give no opinion whatever. On the facts of this case the warrant remained good, and the defendant was therefore entitled to a demand of the copy.

WILLIAMS J. I need not give any opinion how far, upon the discovery of a mistake in a matter of fact, the justices would have power to withdraw their warrant. But here the evidence satisfies me that the real cause of superseding the warrant was a doubt entertained respecting the propriety of the allowance of the accounts. They wished to enter again into the consideration of the accounts. But they had no right to rescind their warrant for this purpose.

The KING against JOHN HENRY MANNERS
SUTTON, Esquire.

THIS was an indictment for the non-repair of Kelham Bridge, in the county of Nottingham, which the defendant was alleged to be liable to repair, ratione tenuræ. The indictment was in the common form. At the trial before Tindal C. J. at the Derby Spring assizes, 1834, the following facts appeared. The defendant's father died intestate, seised of the estate in respect of which the obligation to repair was said to attach, and leaving his widow, the defendant's mother, and the defendant, his son and heir at law, him surviving. The defendant was eleven years old, and was in a course of education from home, but passed his vacations there, and occasionally made a visit there at other times. His mother was his guardian (a), and resided on the property, dwelling in the mansion house. The jury found for the crown.

In Easter term 1834, Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, moved, upon leave reserved, for a rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendant, or a new trial non-repair, if there were no other person against whom performance of the repairs could be enforced.

Quære, whether an owner, who is not the occupier, of lands charged with repair of a bridge, be indictable for non-repair?

(a) At the time of the trial she was acting under an order of the Court of Chancery, which, however, appears to have been made after the day laid in the indictment. No notice was taken of it in the arguments on shewing cause, or in the judgment of the Court.

An infant, eleven years old, inherited land charged with repair of a bridge. His guardian in socage resided on the property; the infant did not, except on occasional visits: Held,

1. That although the infant was actually seised, yet, being so by the possession of his guardian, he was not such owner or occupier of the land, as to be chargeable by indictment for non-repair of the bridge.

2. That the guardian was such an owner and occupier.

Semble, that infancy would not exempt a party, liable in other respects, from indictment for such had. The grounds of motion were, first, that the defendant was not liable to this indictment, because he was an infant; secondly, that he was not liable, inasmuch as he was not the occupier of the land; thirdly and fourthly, that evidence had been improperly admitted and rejected; and, lastly, misdirection. A rule nisi was granted on all the points except the last, which was of no general importance; and in the ultimate judgment of the Court the first two only were noticed.

Sir F. Pollock, Balguy, N. R. Clarke, and Waddington shewed cause in last Easter term (a). First, as to the liability in respect of occupation. It is not correct to say that an occupier only is liable to the repair of bridges, ratione tenuræ. To this point, 1 Roll. Abr. p. 390. tit. Chimin Common (B.) pl. 2. was cited in moving for the rule. It is said there “un owner de terre qui nest l’occupier de ceo, ne poet estre charge a repaier un common chimin, mes solmen le occupier. Hil. 11 Car. B. R. en un Forster’s case.” And this is repeated in Com. Dig. Chimin (A. 4.) p. 27., and occurs also (apparently translated from Rolle) in 1 D’Anvers’s Abridgement, 783., tit. Chimin (B.) (a) pl. 2., where Palm. 389. (b) is referred to for the same point. But these authorities relate to highways only; the case in Palmer (also reported in 2 Roll. Rep. (c)) arose upon an indictment under stat. 2 & 3 Ph. & M. c. 8., which expressly mentions occupiers; and the placitum in Roll. Abr. may probably have reference to the same statute. as to bridges, is, to throw the liability ratione tenuræ upon the owner. The charge is in respect of the estate, without regard to the person who may occupy; and therefore Lord Coke says, 2 Inst. 703. s. 5., "An infant that hath house or lands by descent or purchase, is liable to this public charge" (repair of bridges under stat. 22 H. 8. c. 5. s. 3.), "and so is the husband of a feme covert." [Littledale J. In The Queen v. Sir John Bucknell (a) Lord Holt speaks of the liability to repair a bridge ratione tenuræ, as a charge on the possession, and says that "every tenant in possession, be he but tenant for years or at will, is bound to repair."] No doubt that is so as to a tenant for years; and in Regina v. Watson (b) it was adjudged that a tenant at will was bound by reason of his possession to repair his house adjoining a common bridge: that, however, was in order that the public might not be prejudiced; but it was said that he was not compellable to repair as to his landlord. [Littledale J. Do you say that both owner and occupier are chargeable?] There is no reason why they should not be so. When the occupier is chargeable it is because the owner cannot be found; the occupier is then primâ facie the owner. And that is consistent with the doctrine laid down in 2 Wms. Saund. 158 d. note (9) to Rex v. Stoughton, where it is said, "It seems that the occupier and not the owner is the proper person" to be indicted, "for how are the public to know who is the owner of the lands charged with the repair?" and Regina v. Watts (c) and The Queen v. Bucknell (a) are cited. But, if the owner can be found, as in this case, there is no need to indict the occupier, and thereby occasion a multiplicity of proceedings. The liability is, in principle, a charge upon the land, and in the nature of a service; and therefore it belongs, properly, to the owner. [Littledale J. You say, then, that if tenant in fee leased for ninety-nine years, and the tenant underlet for twenty-one, and the under-lessee from year to year, all would be liable.] That would follow. But the occupier is liable only for the sake of public convenience. And, if a tenant at will were indicted and fined, he would have his remedy against the owner or any other party chargeable, The Queen v. Sir John Bucknell (a). A corporation may be liable ratione tenuræ, though they cannot, properly speaking, have any personal occupation of the land. It would be a hardship on the public, if an owner could relieve himself from the duty by putting in an insolvent tenant: at any rate it would be an inconvenience if an expensive repair might in any instance be thrown upon a multitude of small farmers. He who is in the receipt of the rents and profits, is the proper person to be looked to. The very expression ratione tenuræ does not imply a mere occupation; and repairs done by a mere tenant or undertenant, who might not have sufficient interest to induce him to defend an indictment, would be no satisfactory evidence of liability on a subsequent occasion.

But, further, if an occupation is requisite, the defendant here did occupy, by his guardian. Where there is a liability in respect of an estate, it attaches to every part of the estate, though the whole be divided among several hands; Regina v. The Duchess of Buccleugh (b). The guardian here occupied the mansion house, and possession by the guardian in socage was possession by the ward, 1 Cruise's Dig. p. 50. tit. L. s. 25. (a), Goodtitle dem. Newman v. Newman (b), and Co. Litt. 88 b, where it is laid down that guardian in socage "hath nothing to his own use, but to the use of the heir." [Coleridge J. Do you consider the guardian an occupier?] She is at all events not so while the infant remains with her. [Coleridge J. A guardian in socage gains a settlement by residence with the infant on the estate (c). And if the guardian is an occupier, is the infant so at the same time?] It is true the guardian gains a settlement; but that is merely by the right of residing irremovably on the estate, which the infant has also. And if the guardian is liable as an occupier, it does not follow that the infant may not be so too.

Then as to the objection that an infant is not liable to this indictment; in support of that proposition, 4 Bl. Comm. 22. was cited, where it is said, "The law of England does in some cases privilege an infant, under the age of twenty-one, as to common misdemeanors; so as to escape fine, imprisonment, and the like: and particularly in cases of omission, as not repairing a bridge, or a highway, and other similar offences: for, not having the command of his fortune, till twenty-one, he wants the capacity to do those things, which the law requires. But where there is any notorious breach of the peace, a riot, battery, or the like, (which infants, when full grown, are at least as liable as others to commit) for these an infant, above the age of fourteen, is equally liable to suffer, as a person of the full age of twenty-one." The exemption from penalties for non-repair of a bridge is stated on the authority of Hale; but the passage referred to (a) directly contradicts the proposition. Lord Hale says: "If an infant under the age of twenty-one years be indicted of any misdemeanor, as a riot or battery, he shall not be privileged barely by reason that he is under twenty-one years, but if he be convicted thereof by due trial, he shall be fined and imprisoned; and the reason is, because upon his trial the Court ex officio ought to consider and examine the circumstances of the fact, whether he was doli capax, and had discretion to do the act wherewith he is charged; and the same law is of a femina covert. 2. But if the offence charged by the indictment be a mere non-feasance, (unless it be of such a thing as he is bound to by reason of tenure, or the like as to repair a bridge, &c.) there in some cases he shall be privileged by his nonage, if under twenty-one, though above fourteen years, because Laches in such a case shall not be imputed to him." The dictum of Blackstone is therefore unsupported; and it is observable that he draws no distinction between infants under fourteen and under twenty-one. But here that is not material. The distinctions as to the criminal liability of an infant at different ages below twenty-one turn upon his being or not being doli capax. Civilly, he is liable for a tort at any age, as appears from the Yearbook Mich. 35 H. 6. f. 11 B. pl. 18.; and an indictment for the non-repair of a bridge is in its nature no more a criminal proceeding, as it affects the infant, than an action of waste. It is only a mode of ascertaining whether or not an obligation attaches to him by reason of his title to certain lands. No malus animus is charged, or need be shewn.

There

There is no reason, therefore, that an infant either above or below fourteen, should not be subjected to such an indictment. And the passage cited from Lord Hale justifies this position. It is said there, that in some cases of non-feasance, an infant, though above fourteen, shall be privileged; but the cases are not specified, and the omission to repair a bridge is excepted. In 2 Inst. 703., the infant's liability is stated without limit as to age. The authorities on this subject are collected in 4 Bac. Abr. (a), Infancy and Age (H), where it is said that in cases of misdemeanors, &c., where an infant is privileged by his nonage "the privilege is all one, whether he be above the age of fourteen, or under, if he be under one-and-twenty years, but with these differences: if an infant" &c., then follows the passage already cited from Hale, with the exception in the case of non-repair of a bridge. To put an analogous case; a corporation, as such, cannot, in the ordinary sense of words, commit a crime: it can have no malus animus; yet it is indictable for neglect of repairs; because, although the words "indictment" and "misdemeanor" are used, the matter charged is only that the body is liable to something which has not been performed; the proceeding is merely a mode given by the English law, of ascertaining who is subject to a particular obligation. A strong argument arises from the inconvenience which the public would suffer if this proceeding could not take place till the infant attained majority. There are several instances, in civil proceedings, where it has been laid down the parol should not demur on account of infancy, because of the public or even private inconvenience which would be thereby occasioned; as, for instance, in a quare impedit, in an action of waste (a), a writ of estrepement, or a writ of dower. Many other instances are collected in 2 Vin. Abr. 137. tit. Age. (B.) (b). Here the duty in question is in the nature of a service, the proceeding by indictment does not alter its character in that respect, and there is no other mode of enforcing the service. The nonage, therefore, ought not to be an answer. It was holden in Conny's Case (c), that, in a per quæ servitia, an infant, who has the tenancy by descent, should not have his age. [Littledale J. There are many cases in which infants are answerable if they do not perform a duty; as if an infant has a grant of an office exerciseable by deputy, and if he do not appoint a sufficient one, it is a forfeiture of the office (d)]. It is true that the infant, if convicted on such an indictment as this, cannot be imprisoned; and some difficulty may be raised as to fining: but the difficulties, if he be held not liable, are greater; and it is to be presumed that, if the verdict passes against him, the guardians will perform what is necessary on his part. The excuse of infancy is rather matter for a plea in abatement than for a defence under the general issue, since there is neither malus animus, nor any other material fact charged by the indictment, to which infancy could be an answer. [Littledale J. Who ever heard of pleading infancy to an indictment? Can the infant pray that the parol may demur till he is of age? Coleridge J. According to the assumption on the defendant's side, infancy would be a defence under the general issue,

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, Adams Serjt., and Amos, contra. First, as to the liability of an infant. It is admitted on the other side that the case, if it were that of an infant of the most tender years, would not be distinguishable from the present. And it is contended that an indictment lies against him, although it is granted that on conviction there could be no imprisonment, and it would be difficult to levy a fine. Then cui bono is the alleged liability? The non-repair of a bridge is, in law, a crime; it is presented by the grand jury among felonies and misdemeanors, and is as much a misdemeanor as any nuisance by the non-repair or obstruction of a highway. The king prosecutes; the pleading, and the process relative to it, are like those in other cases of misdemeanor; and the prescribed punishment, on conviction, is imprisonment and fine. [Cole-ridge J. How is the infant to appear, and to avail himself of his infancy?] No mode is pointed out, in any stage of the proceedings. And how could a distringas to compel appearance be made available against an infant eleven years old, who has nothing to do with the land? All these difficulties shew that the course now attempted, against an infant of tender years, is not known to the law. With respect to pleading in civil causes, the law points out a mode of proceeding; the infant appears by his guardian or next friend. In the case of an indictment there is no such provision. And yet, if judgment goes by default, it is conclusive for ever after. There is no necessity that this mode of proceeding against an infant should be adopted. The occupier may be resorted to. Here an occupier is found, namely, the mother, who is the common law guardian in socage, and occupies the mansion-house. If this had been the case of a guardianship in chivalry, when the rents and profits were all taken by the lord, it cannot be contended that the infant would have been held liable: the change of tenure by stat. 12 Car. 2. c. 24. has not changed the liability and thrown it upon the infant. A guardian in socage does not indeed receive the rents to his own use, but they vest in him till the infant attains the age of fourteen. In Rex v. Toddington (a), Holroyd J. recognises the obligation of the guardian in socage to perform the services annexed to the infant's estate. As to his interest, in Rex v. Oakley (b) Lord Ellenborough says, "The only difference which can be pointed out between the cases of an executor or administrator and of a guardian in socage, in this respect" (the right to a personal occupation and superintendence of the infant's estate), "is that the one is accountable for the profits by statute, and the other at common law. The law considers a guardian in socage as entitled to the possession of the ward's property, and incapable of being removed from it by any person. Such a guardian has not a mere office or authority, but an interest in the ward's estate." The same view of the guardian's interest in the estate is taken in Osborn v. Carden (c), and Bedell v. Constable (d). The guardian in socage obtains a settlement by his residence on the estate; no case has been cited to shew that the heir does so too. Here, then, the mother might have been indicted, or the tenants on the estate; if the infant is to be prosecuted, the estate may be unjustly burdened by a proceeding against one who cannot defend.

And, as neither necessity nor convenience are in favour of an indictment against the infant, so also is it unsupported by authorities. No precedent is shewn for it. The passage cited from 1 Hale, 20. only states that in some cases of non-feasance the infant shall be privileged if under twenty-one, "though above fourteen years;" "unless," &c. The case of an infant under fourteen is not at all adverted to. The dictum in 2 Inst. 703. (which is referred to in the passage of Hale just cited), that an infant having house or lands by descent or purchase "is liable to this public charge," does not necessarily imply that he may be indicted. It means, only, that the infant may be rated as an inhabitant of the county, and that, if the county be indicted (in which case there is no difficulty as to the infant's pleading), his land is liable to contribution. As to the cases in which it has been laid down that an infant should not have his age, Conny's Case (a) was that of a civil action; and in all the other instances the infant might appear by guardian. On the other hand, it is evident, from several authorities, that the law is tender of fining and amercing infants. Thus, in Hawk. P. C. book 2. c. 23. s. 159., it is said, "Also it is certain that an infant is in no case to be fined for a false appeal; but some have holden that he may be amerced, which is contradicted by others, who say, that an infant can in no case be amerced." And in Co. Lit. 126 b. it is asked: "What then if a præcipe be brought against an infant, and, hanging the plea, he cometh of full age? He shall be amerced for the delay after his full age." [Lord Denman C. J. Suppose, in the present case, the infant himself had been the occupier; would no person have been liable to indictment?] There would be either a testamentary guardian, or a guardian in socage to proceed against. [Lord Denman C. J. Not necessarily. He might be nullius filius. Littledale J. If he were above fourteen, or took by purchase (a), there would be no guardian in socage.] Perhaps the Court of Chancery would appoint a guardian. [Patteson J. A guardian appointed by the Court of Chancery would be only in the nature of a receiver. He would be little more than a bailiff or servant. And such a guardian does not occupy personally.] The cases put are too improbable to guide the judgment of the Court in laying down a rule. At all events an infant of tender years would not be indictable; he could not be an occupier for this purpose. And the Court cannot draw a line between infants of one age and another. [Lord Denman C. J. An infant of tender years may be executed for felony. Is an infant guilty of no punishable offence, if he, being liable by tenure to repair, and being in receipt of the rents, refuses to do repairs?] No line can be drawn, as to this, between one infant and another, at least below the age of fourteen. [Lord Denman C. J. Lord Hale, in speaking of misdemeanors for which an infant may be indicted, says (b) that the Court "ought to consider and examine the circumstances of the fact, whether he was doli capax, and had discretion to do the act wherewith he is charged."] Supposing that test applied, the defendant, under the circumstances of this case, could not be held responsible. [Patteson J. As to the question of liability: an infant is liable to an action in case of tort. Suppose a person had a limb broken in consequence of the defective state of the bridge. Would not an action lie at his suit against the infant who was bound to repair?] The difficulty of the present case would not be felt there. A guardian might be appointed to defend. On indictment there is no course by which the interests of the infant could be protected.

(a) See Harg. Co. Litt. 87 b. note (1).

As to the point of occupation: the owner, if he is not also the occupier, is not liable for non-repair. 1 Roll. Abr. p. 390. tit. Chimin Common (B) pl. 2., Com. Dig. Chimin (A 4.), are clear authorities on this point, unless a distinction can be made between a bridge and a highway, for which there is no ground, a bridge being part of the highway. Note (9.) to Rex v. Stoughton (a), and the cases there cited, are to the same effect. The possession of the mother as guardian, whatever might have been its effect with reference to a possessio fratris, is not such an occupation by the infant as can subject him to this indictment.

Cur. ado. vult.

LORD DENMAN C. J., on a subsequent day of this term (b), delivered the judgment of the Court. After stating the nature of the indictment, and the verdict, his Lordship said:—

Upon the argument on a motion for a new trial, several points were insisted on; but, as this case will be decided upon one only, it is unnecessary to do more than to state that one, with the facts on which it rested, and the reasons for our decision.

It appeared that the defendant was the son and heir of The Reverend Frederick Manners Sutton, who died intestate and seised of the property on which the obligation to repair attached; that he was an infant of the age of eleven years, in a course of education from home, passing his vacations there, and occasionally visiting it; that his mother was his guardian, and resided on the property.

Under these circumstances it was contended, that the defendant was not the occupier, and that the occupier only could be indicted for non-repair. As we are of opinion that he was neither an owner nor an occupier in the sense required to make him chargeable upon this indictment, it will be unnecessary for us to decide generally, whether owners, merely as such, and not in occupation, are liable to charges of this description, as no doubt can exist as to the liability of occupiers. Considering it then as settled law, that the occupier of land charged with the repair of a bridge is liable to the performance of that duty, and assuming only for the purpose of the argument, that the owner, as such, may be also liable, the question for our consideration will be, whether the defendant is either the occupier or the owner of the lands here charged, in such a sense as is required for the purposes of the present indictment; and this will depend upon a consideration, as well of the facts above stated, as of the nature of the duty for the neglect of which he is charged.

Now as to the former we can only take the possession of the defendant's mother to be that of a guardian in socage; and it is clear from several authorities, that to some purposes the infant, whose guardian in socage has entered entered and is in possession, is considered in law as not merely the owner in right, but the owner in actual seisin of the lands. This is so for the purpose of transmitting land by descent, or excluding the half blood by a possession fratris; Bro. Abr. Descent. 19.; Goodtitle dem. Newman v. Newman (a), in each of which cases an actual entry and possession, at least by construction of law, are necessary. The defendant, therefore, may be taken to be an owner actually seised; but then it is by his guardian: and his wardship precludes him entirely from any control over the land, or any disposal of the issues; he can at present claim his maintenance from it and no more. This is the nature of the defendant's present relation to the land.

Next, as to the duty to be performed, it is to be observed, that this is not merely the duty of any inhabitant of a county with regard to a bridge repairable by the county, to submit, namely, to an assessment on his lands, and a distress in case of non-payment, the amount of the assessment being to be paid over to public officers, who are charged with the actual superintendence and performance of the repairs. To this duty an infant is expressly declared by Lord Coke to be liable, if he hath house or lands by descent or purchase; 2 Inst. 703. But an individual, charged as the defendant is, is himself required to do the act, the law not interfering either to controul or assist him in the manner of procuring or applying the funds necessary for the purpose. It should seem reasonable therefore to suppose that the owner or the occupier, who is to be held liable criminally for non-repair, should be one in whom the law supposes to be vested a command over and actual possession of the profits of the land; and we ought to require some principle or authority for holding that the liability attaches under other circumstances.

It is true that, if it could be shewn that no other person was in a situation to be called on for the performance of the duty, and that the public would receive detriment by considering the ward not liable, there are not wanting analogies in the law which would justify us in enforcing the performance of it by him. It is sufficient to refer for this purpose to the numerous cases collected in 4 Bac. Abr., Infancy and Age (L), in which an infant suing or being sued, his age was not allowed, nor the parol permitted to demur, the principle of which was, that thereby some inconvenience would ensue to the public, or some injustice be done to the parties, more than countervailing the acknowledged inconvenience of suffering the suit to proceed during the nonage.

The remaining question, therefore, is, whether the guardian in socage in possession is such an owner or occupier as to be properly liable to the discharge of this burden. Now it is clear that the guardian in socage, after entry, has the legal possession of the land to the use of the infant. It is observed by Bayley J., in Rex v. Oakley (a), that the form of pleading by a guardian in socage was, that he entered as such, and was possessed. During the continuance of his interest he is in the entire receipt of the profits, and he is invested with the absolute control over their immediate disposal, subject only to the maintenance of the heir. He may bring trespass or ejectment in his own name, and make a lease also in the same, until the infant's age of fourteen; Wade v. Baker and Cole (a). The courts should be held in his name; Shopland v. Rysler (b): and he may grant copyholds, in reversion even, the grants of which will be good, though they come not into possession during the nonage of the ward; 2 Roll. Abr. 41. Garde, (Q.) pl. 3.

The King
against Sutton.

The guardian then being in possession, and receiving and disposing of all the issues, subject only to the infant's maintenance and a future account, is undoubtedly such an owner and occupier as may properly be looked to by the public for the discharge of all those obligations to which the land is bound; and there is no injustice or inconvenience in this, because, upon the account which he is to render to the infant, he "shall have allowance of all his reasonable costs and expenses in all things." Litt. s. 123.

Upon the whole, therefore, we conclude that, even assuming it to be true, generally, that an owner not in possession may be bound, as well as the occupier, to the performance of repairs to a bridge, ratione tenuræ, still that an infant, in ward to a guardian in socage in possession, does not fall within the reason of that rule; and, consequently, that the defendant in the present case, and on the facts now appearing, should have been acquitted.

Ex parte WINFIELD.

The Court will grant a rule absolute in the first instance for a mandamus to the archdeacon, to swear in a party as churchwarden, on affidavit of due election, demand, and refusal, and of notice to the archdeacon of the application to the Court; the ground of refusal not appearing by the affidavit in support of the rule.

HILL applied for a mandamus to the Archdeacon of Coventry, directing him to swear in John Winfield as churchwarden of the parish of St. Martin's, in Birmingham, in the county of Warwick. The affidavit stated that Winfield had been unanimously elected at a regular meeting of the inhabitants of the parish in vestry assembled, and afterwards received a notice from the officer of the ecclesiastical court of the Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, in which diocese the parish is situate, to attend the archdeacon's visitation to qualify, &c.: that he subsequently attended at the appointed time and place, and presented himself to the archdeacon to take the oath, and, in consequence of an informality, was directed to present himself again on another day: that he did so present himself on that day, when objections were made to him by another person, which he considered untenable (but which were not stated in the affidavit), in consequence of which the archdeacon had refused to swear him in.

Notice had been given to the archdeacon that this Court would be applied to.

SIR W. W. FOLLETT had obtained a rule in Easter term last, calling upon the archdeacon, and the official duly constituted surrogate of the archdeaconry of Middlesex, to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding them, or one of them, or other competent judge in that behalf, to swear in James Haward and Robert Taylor as churchwardens, and four others as sidesmen, of the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, in the county of Middlesex. The affidavits in support of the rule stated that Haward and Taylor were, on Easter Monday and Tuesday, April 21 and 22, duly elected as churchwardens, and the other four as sidesmen, and the result of the scrutiny on the election finally reported at a vestry meeting on the 27th of April 1835; and that they, after the meeting, had attended at the chambers of Dr. Phillimore, the surrogate, and required to be sworn in. That Dr. Phillimore had declined to swear them until the annual visitation of the archdeacon, on the 19th of May, had taken place, stating, however, that, although it was customary to wait till the visitation, the churchwardens had sometimes been admitted immediately on their election, if he (Dr. Phillimore) were satisfied that it was a case of emergency, and adding, that he

A rule nisi having been obtained for a mandamus to an archdeacon and surrogate, to swear in certain persons as churchwardens and sidesmen of a parish, it appeared by affidavit that the parties were colourably elected, but that the validity of the election was disputed; that there was an usage in the archdeaconry to swear in the parties elected, on a certain day subsequent to the election, appointed annually by the archdeacon; and that the surrogate, being applied to immediately after the election to swear in the parties, had said that they must wait till the day appointed, but that he would not disobey a mandamus from this Court: Held, that this was a refusal, and that the usage, if a good one, should be returned to the mandamus; and the Court made the rule absolute, without entering into the question of the validity of the election.

would obey the mandamus of the Court. Notice was then given to him that application would be made to the Court. There was also an affidavit that Dr. Philimore had, on a subsequent day, stated that he declined to swear in the applicants, on the ground of the conflicting claims of other candidates. The affidavits in answer stated that it was the immemorial usage and custom in the parish, and other parishes in the same archdeaconry (of Middlesex), that a day should be appointed by the archdeacon to swear in the churchwardens of all the parishes, and that the day appointed for the present year was the 19th of May. The affidavits in support of the rule also contained statements to shew the due election of the applicants; and those against the rule, to shew that other candidates ought to have been declared elected under stat. 58 G. 3. c. 69.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, now shewed cause. It is true that, as Harward and Taylor have a colourable title, the Court will direct a mandamus to swear them in, without deciding on the title at this stage. But here there has been no refusal.

Sir W. IV. Follett (with whom was Steer), contra, contended that what had passed amounted to a refusal. He also proceeded to argue that the usage was not a good answer; but he was stopped by the Court.

Lord DENMAN C. J. It is to be lamented, either that this motion was made, or that the opposing party did not consent to the rule being made absolute. There has been a refusal. When the party says, "I will wait, because there is a custom," he, in effect, refuses. If there be such a custom, he may return it; and to say that he will not disobey the order of this Court, amounts to a refusal to comply without the order.

The KING against The Company of Proprietors
of the MONMOUTHSHIRE Canal Navigation.

Wednesday,

BY a poor-rate made for the borough of Newport, Monmouthshire, the Company of Proprietors of the Monmouthshire Canal Navigation were rated as the occupiers of that part of their canal lying within the borough of Newport, and a house, tramroad, weighing machine, coach-house, &c., also within the said borough, in the following form:

purpose of constructing a canal and railways, and to take tolls; and it was provided that the tolls should not, at any time or times thereafter, be subject to taxes or rates, and that the company should, from time to time, be rated in respect of the lands and grounds to be taken, and the buildings to be erected by them, in the same proportion as, and not at any higher value or improved rent, than other lands, grounds, and buildings adjacent were or should, for the time being, be rated, and as the lands, grounds, and buildings, to be taken and erected by them, would have been rateable, in case they had continued in their former state, and not been used for the purposes of the undertaking. The adjacent lands and buildings improved in value, from the time of the commencement of the undertaking, partly in consequence of the undertaking being carried into effect, partly from independent causes: Held, that the land and buildings used for the canal were to be rated at the value which the adjacent lands, &c., bore at the time of the rate; and not at the value which these latter bore at the commencement of the undertaking, nor at that which they would have borne at the time of the rate if the undertaking had not been carried into effect. Although, from the passing of the act to the time of the question being raised (forty years), the rate had always been made according to the original value of the lands adjacent.

2. A subsequent statute authorized the company to extend the canal, and to purchase lands for that purpose; and it provided, that they might take the like tolls on the new canal, &c. as under the former act, and have the like powers and remedies for recovering them. And that the clauses, powers, authorities, provisos, orders, rules, regulations, limitations, exemptions, restrictions, privileges, penalties, forfeitures, punishments, and provisions contained in the former act, should, so far as the same would apply and the case would admit, extend to the new canal, &c. and should take effect, operate, be put in execution, used, and exercised by the company, and be applied and enforced in respect of making, maintaining, and using the new canal, &c. and regulating the navigation thereon, for punishing offences relating thereto, for purchasing lands and assessing damages, and with respect to all matters in anywise touching the new canal, &c. in the same manner to all intents and purposes as if the same clauses, &c., had been inserted, repeated, and enacted, at full length, by the subsequent act, and as if the new canal, &c. had been a part of the canal authorized to be made by the former act: Held, that the provision as to rating the original canal extended to the new part.

3. By a third statute, a tramroad company was incorporated, and it and the canal company were authorized to make railways, and to take such tolls on these railways as the canal company might take by the first statute; and it was provided, that the clauses, powers, authorities, regulations, &c. (as in the second statute), of the first statute, should extend (in the same terms as in the second) to the railways last-mentioned, and to regulating the carriage or conveyance of goods thereon, as if these railways had been authorized to be made by the first statute, and the tramroad company had been therein named instead of the canal company: Held, that the provision as to rating the original canal extended to these railways.

On appeal, the sessions confirmed the rate, subject to the opinion of this Court upon the following case:—

By stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102., The Company of Proprietors of the Monmouthshire Canal Navigation were incorporated, and empowered to make, amongst other canals and railways, and to keep navigable, a canal from some place near Pontnewynydd, in the parish of Trevethin, in Monmouthshire, to the river Usk, at or near Newport, and to purchase lands for the use of the said undertaking (a); and by sections 91. and 95. they were empowered to take certain tolls. By sect. 101. it was enacted, that “the said rates, tolls, and duties by this act granted” to the said company, “shall not at any time or times hereafter be charged with or be subject or liable to the payment of any parliamentary or parochial rates, taxes, assessments, or impositions whatsoever; and that the said company of proprietors, and their successors, shall from time to time be rated to all parliamentary and parochial rates, taxes, assessments, and impositions, for and in respect of the lands and grounds to be purchased or taken, and the warehouses and other buildings to be erected or set up, by the said company, or their successors, in pursuance of this act, in such and the same proportion as, but not at any higher value or improved rent, than other lands,

(a) By the first section, the company were empowered to make rail or waggon ways, or stone roads, from the canals or railroads mentioned above, to any iron works, limestone quarries, or coal mines, within eight miles thereof, and to enter upon lands, &c.; and, by sect. 38., the purchase-money and compensation to be paid to the owners of lands used was to be settled by certain commissioners, with an appeal to a jury.

grounds, and buildings lying near or adjacent thereto, are or shall, for the time being, be rated, and as the lands, grounds, warehouses, and other buildings so to be purchased and taken, and erected, would have been rateable in case the same had continued in their former state, and not been used for the purposes of the said navigation or undertaking." By virtue of this act the company purchased lands, and made the intended canal; part of which lies within the borough of Newport, and is the land taken for the purposes of such canal, included in the above rate.

Stat. 37 G. 3. c. 100., after reciting stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102., empowered the canal company to extend the said canal about one mile and a half beyond its then termination, and to purchase lands for the purpose of such extension: and, by sect. 1. of the statute of 37 G. 3., it was enacted, that the company should take the like tolls on the canal thereby authorized to be made, as they were empowered to demand by the former act; and should "have such and the like powers and remedies for recovering the same; and that the said recited act, and the several clauses, powers, authorities, provisions, orders, rules, regulations, limitations, exemptions, restrictions, privileges, penalties, forfeitures, punishments, and provisions therein contained, shall, so far as the same will apply, and the nature and circumstances of the case will admit, and so far as the same are not repealed, altered, re-enacted, or otherwise provided for in and by this present act, extend and are hereby extended to the said canal and other works hereby authorized, and shall take effect, operate, and be put in execution, and shall be used and exercised by the said company of proprietors, and their agents, servants, and labourers, and shall be applied and enforced in, by, and for and in respect of the making, completing, repairing, preserving, maintaining, and using, the said canal and other works hereby authorized, and for supplying the same with water, and for regulating the navigation thereon, and for the punishment of offences relating thereto, and for the purchasing, selling, and conveying of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and ascertaining the value thereof, and for the determining and assessing of damages, as well as with respect to all other matters and things whatsoever, in anywise touching or concerning the said canal and other works hereby authorized to be made, in such and the same manner in all respects, and as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if the same clauses, powers, authorities, provisoes, orders, rules," &c. "had been inserted, repeated, and enacted, at full length, in and by this present act, and as if the canal and other works hereby authorized to be made and maintained had been authorized to be made and maintained in and by the said recited act, or been part of the canals and works thereby authorized to be made and maintained." By virtue of the last-mentioned act, the canal company extended their said canal: and part of the land taken for that purpose is included in the above rate.

Stat. 42 G. 3. c. cxv. (local and personal, public), after reciting stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102., and stat. 37 G. 3. c. 100., and that it was expedient that a railway should be made from Sirhowy furnaces, in the said county, to communicate with the said canal and the river Usk, at or near Newport, together with certain branches of railway from the said last-mentioned railway, and after incorporating a certain company called The Sirhowy Tram-road road Company, empowered the Company of proprietors of the Monmouthshire canal navigation to purchase lands, and to make a certain portion of the said last-mentioned railways; and, by sect. 3., it was provided that the said Sirhowy tramroad company, and the Monmouthshire canal navigation company, respectively, might take the like tolls, for the tonnage of commodities conveyed on the said railways or tramroads, as the Monmouthshire canal navigation company are authorized to take by stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102. for tonnage, &c., on the canals and railways thereby authorized to be made, except as was after provided; and should, respectively, have the like powers for recovering such tolls as were given by the first-mentioned act, for recovering the rates, tolls, and duties therein mentioned: "and that the said first-mentioned act, and the several clauses, powers, authorities, regulations, limitations, exemptions, restrictions, privileges, penalties, forfeitures, punishments, and provisions therein contained and mentioned, shall, so far as the same will apply," &c. to be made by them, and as if the said railway or tramroad, and other works hereby authorized to be made by the said Sirhowy tramroad company, had been part of the railways and other works authorized to be made by the said first-mentioned act, and the said Sirhowy tramroad company had been therein named and authorized to make the same in the stead and place of the said company of proprietors of the Monmouthshire canal navigation." By virtue of the last-mentioned act, the Monmouthshire canal navigation company made a portion of certain railways, part of which lies within the said borough, and is included in the above rate.

Before and at the time of the formation of the said canal and railways, the land purchased by the canal company for the purposes of the said canal and railways, and the land on each side of it, was of very much less value than at present. The whole of the land taken for the railways, and a part of the land taken for the purposes of the original canal, was then used for agricultural purposes, and let at the rent usually given for good meadow land in the neighbourhood of towns: other part of the land taken for the said original canal was, at the time it was so taken, used as wharf ground to the river Usk; and other part of the same land then formed a part of one of the streets of Newport. But, in consequence of the formation of the canal and railways, great alterations have been made in the lands adjacent to the said canal, as to the manner of their occupation and the purposes for which they are used; and, by means thereof, their present annual value is very much greater than it was at the time of the formation of the canal and railways. Their value has also since increased from other local causes, independent of the said said canal. The canal runs for some distance within the borough of Newport, parallel with the river Usk, which, before and at the time of the formation of the said original canal, was, and ever since has been, used as a navigable river; and, when the canal was formed, a convenient space of ground was left between it and the river for making wharfs, and wharfs have been from time to time constructed on that space (but not by the canal company), at which the coals and other goods conveyed along the canal are landed, and thence loaded on board vessels lying in the river, and at which also goods conveyed in vessels up the said river are landed, and thence loaded on board boats on the said canal. On the opposite side of the canal dwelling houses have been erected, and yards and docks formed, extending for a considerable distance along the side of the said canal, within the said borough; none of which belong to the canal company. The said wharfs, houses, yards, and docks, are now of large annual value. Some part of the lands adjacent to the canal, within the borough of Newport, still continues to be used for agricultural purposes.

Until the present rate was made, the canal company had been rated for the sum of 5*l*. 5*s*. only. By the present rate, the appellants are rated for the lands taken by virtue of stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102. according to the present improved actual value of the lands and premises adjacent to the said canal; and for the lands taken by them under stat. 37 G. 3. c. 100., and stat. 42 G. 3. c. cxv., at the present improved actual value of the lands so taken, arising from such lands being used for the purposes of the last-mentioned acts.

the provisions of stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102. s. 101. were incorporated (a) in stat. 37 G. 3. c. 100. and stat. 42 G. 3. c. CXV., or in one of them, so as to exempt the lands taken by the canal company under the last-mentioned acts from being rated according to their actual improved value arising from the tolls.

Secondly, That the canal company were only liable to be rated in proportion to the actual value of the adjacent lands at the time when the lands held by the company were originally taken for the purposes of the canal or railways.

Thirdly, That, at all events, the canal company were only liable to be rated in proportion to such value as the adjacent lands would now possess, supposing that the canal and railways had not been made, but that the adjacent lands had continued in their former state, and were now used for the same purposes as when the lands were taken by the canal company; and that any increase of value arising from, or depending upon, the existence of the said canal or railroads, ought not to be taken into consideration in ascertaining the value of the adjacent lands for the purpose of fixing the amount of rate on the canal company.

If this Court should be of opinion with the appellants on the first and second, or first and third points, the rate was to be amended by reducing the sum assessed on the appellants in a proportion which was fixed by the case.

not incorporated in the two later acts. The earlier of these two, stat. 37 G. 3. c. 100., was passed five years after the first statute, and after the undertaking had been found to be beneficial: the protection, therefore, given to the undertaking while the result was uncertain, was no longer needed. [Littledale J. It might as well be said, that it had been found that the undertaking did not answer, which made the extension necessary.] The words of stat. 37 G. 3. c. 100. s. 1. (which are substantially the same as those of stat. 42 G. 3. c. cxv. s. 3.), though strong, are not sufficient to comprehend the proviso of exemption from rate. The words "clauses, powers, authorities, provisoes, orders, rules, regulations, limitations, exemptions, restrictions, privileges, penalties, forfeitures, punishments, and provisions," appear to apply altogether to enactments of a different class; and this also appears from the words "used and exercised," and "applied and enforced," which are inapplicable to the exemption contended for. The Court will construe such a clause strictly; and the exemption is less needed for the extension of a canal, than for the original work; Rex v. The Birmingham Canal Company (a). In a case (b) which was before the Court, on these acts, the Court certified that the stat. 42 G. 3. c. cxv. s. 3. had not the effect of incorporating, in this latter act, the 128th section of stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102. power to proprietors of lands, &c., within eight miles of the canals and railways made under the authority of the first act, to call upon the company of proprietors of the Monmouthshire canal navigation to make railways or waggon roads for conveying articles to and from the canals and railways so made. But the words of incorporation apply quite as strongly to such a power (and "powers" is a word used in the incorporating clause) as to an exemption from tolls: and the presumption that the legislature meant to apply the enact-the distance of eight miles from any part of the said canals, or railways, hereinbefore particularly described and authorised to be made as aforesaid, shall deem it expedient or necessary that any railways or waggon roads should be made over, through, to, along, in, upon, or under the lands or grounds of any other person or persons, or across any highway or highways, or private road or roads, or that any bridges should be erected over and across any rivers, brooks, or watercourses, for the purpose of conveying his, her, or their iron," &c., "or any goods, wares, or merchandizes, to or from the said canals, or railways, hereinbefore particularly described, and if the said company of proprietors shall refuse to make any such railway, or waggon road, or to erect any such bridge, in virtue of the powers hereinbefore given them in that behalf, for the space of three calendar months after an application and request in writing shall have been made to them for that purpose, at a general meeting or assembly to be held as hereinbefore is mentioned, by the person or persons so deeming it expedient that such railway or waggon road should be made, or such bridge erected as aforesaid, then and in such case, and from time to time as often as the same shall happen, it shall and may be lawful to and for the person or persons making such application and request, at his or their own proper costs and charges, at any time after the expiration of such three calendar months, without the consent of the owner or owners of such lands or grounds," &c. "to make any such railways, or waggon ways, or to erect any such bridge or bridges as shall be deemed expedient to be made or erected as aforesaid, he or they first paying or tendering satisfaction," &c. The act then prescribed the method of ascertaining the compensation, directed certain specifications to be made, if required, to the company, and enacted that the railways, &c. so to be made, should be open to the public on payment of the like tolls as those payable to the company.

ment of sect. 128. to the extension of the original work was much stronger; since the enactment, both in the case of the original work and the extension, was in furtherance of the public object of the undertaking, namely, facilitating communication.

Secondly. The rating is to be in the same proportion as adjacent lands, &c. are or shall be rated for the time being. The time of rating is thus the time at which the comparison is to be made. The legislature might easily have said, if it was intended, that the lands were to be rated according to the value they possessed at the time of the act passing. But the fair way of applying the enactment is, to take the value which the lands in question would have had if the canal had been made in adjacent lands. Why is the particular time at which the acts passed to be fixed upon as that after which the value of the land is not to be considered capable of increase or diminution? As to the warehouses and buildings to be erected, how can they be rated according to the value they had when the act passed? Is the original value of the sites alone to be taken? [Patteson J. The provision is intelligible with respect to the buildings purchased: the framers of the act added the words "and erected," without perceiving the inconsistency with the other words of the clause.] The legislature had two objects. First, the undertaking was to be encouraged, for which purpose the tolls (then considered rateable per se) were exempted. Secondly, the parish was not to lose its vested right in the improveable value of the surface; for which reason the criterion of the value at any time is declared to be the value of adjacent property "for the time being." This was the construction put upon a similar provision, not, however, containing the words "for the time being," in Rex v. The Regent's Canal Company (a), where the judgment of Bayley J. explains the principle upon which the legislature introduce such clauses. The land is rateable for its value as land, without taking into consideration its use as a canal; Rex v. The Leeds and Liverpool Canal Company (b): now that is a fluctuating value. The Court will construe the ambiguity, if there be one, against the party obtaining the act; Rex v. The Birmingham Canal Company (c), Stourbridge Canal Company v. Wheeley (d). This is the first time that any attempt has been made to construe a clause of this kind so as to limit the rate to the value which the canal possessed before the act passed: hitherto, the attempt has always been to limit it to the value which it possessed, as land, at the time of the rating. Thus, in Rex v. The Grand Junction Canal Company (e), the company succeeded in reducing the rate to the value which adjacent lands then had: but it was never suggested that it could be reduced to the value which it or they formerly had. The same remark applies to Rex v. St. Peter the Great, Worcestershire (g), Rex v. St. Mary, Leicester (h), and Rex v. The Chelmer and Blackwater Navigation Company (i), where Lord Tenterden's judgment, p. 18, 19., bears closely on the point. The land is to be rated on the same principle as at the time of its being taken for the act, not on the same value. The case states that the appellants have hitherto been rated only at the 5*l.* 5*s.* It is true that, in Rex v. The Calder and Hebble Navigation Company (a), Lord Ellenborough seems to have held that an exemption of duties taken in respect of the navigation of a canal, was an absolute exemption of the land used for the canal, on the ground that the land had not been rated since the act passed, which was nearly fifty years. [Lord Denman C. J. I think such a fact as that ought not to be taken into consideration in construing an act of parliament.] Even if it could, the acquiescence in a particular value proves much less than the acquiescence in an absolute exemption from rates.

Thirdly. It is against general principles to rate the property at the value which the adjacent lands would have possessed if the undertaking had not been effected. Such a value cannot be estimated. If the works had not been constructed, and all other events had been the same, the effect might have been different in different years. But the hypothesis cannot be reasoned upon at all. Perhaps the want of a canal might have produced a railroad, which might have raised the value; perhaps, instead of this, trade might have been diverted to other quarters for want of communication, which would have lowered the value. It would be as practicable to assess according to the value which the lands would bear forty years after the time of rating.

Greaves, contra, was desired by the Court to confine himself to the second and third questions stated in the case.

As to the second question. The stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102, was passed at a time when tolls were considered rateable. Rex v. Page (a), in which that doctrine was upheld, was decided on the 3d of February 1792. Accordingly, sect. 101. clearly exempts the tolls from being rated, which, as the law was then understood, amounted to an absolute exemption of the lands taken for the purposes of the act. The arguments on the other side would go the length of shewing that the tolls are not exempted by this section; for, according to Rex v. The Calder and Hebble Navigation Company (b), the rate now contended for would be an indirect rate upon the tolls. It is clear, however, that the first words of the section repealed, so far, the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2. The affirmative part of the section, by which the rate is imposed, must be construed strictly. The statute recites (c) that the undertaking will be of great public utility; and it is very natural that the parish should have consented never to receive a rate upon a higher than the present value, on condition of never receiving it upon a lower, especially as the value of the lands adjacent to the canal would be raised if the undertaking were profitable. The value which the lands possessed at the time of the act passing would be easily ascertained. Again, as these statutes are in the nature of a bargain between the parties, the usage is entitled to some weight, as interpreting the intention. [Lord Denman C. J. The usage may have been the result of a composition, or of many other circumstances of which we know nothing.] The later words of the clause, "would have been rateable in case the same had continued in their former state, and not been used for the purposes of the said navigation and undertaking," are strongly in favour of the appellants. The expression "for the time being," does not mean for all future time; that meaning is expressed in the 101st section by the phrases "at any time or times hereafter," and "from time to time." The words "for the time being" mean, either the time at which the lands were first taken, or that at which they were first rated; and the object of inserting these words may have been to prevent the company from insisting that they were not to be rated at all for lands which might happen not to be rated when the act passed. It clearly could mean only one particular time. The attempt is to import a subsequent value, accruing from the conversion of the lands into a canal and railway, into an estimate which, by the express words, is to be made as if the lands had not been so used. Suppose, by the formation of a new railroad, or any other circumstance, the canal were to become unprofitable, while the lands maintained their present value; then, on the construction contended for on the other side, the company, although losers, would be rated on the improved value. [Lord Denman C. J. You might as well, on the other hand, suppose an event to take place which made the adjacent lands untenable.] Then, according to the appellants' construction, the parish, so far as relates to the canal, would be protected from loss.

As to the third question. Objections have been made to the precise test suggested. But, at all events, it is sufficient for the appellants to shew that the rate is not to be imposed according to the whole improved value of the adjacent lands, and that therefore, by some rule or other, the value of the adjacent land, independent of the result of the undertaking, must be recurred to. The first act, by section 1., empowers the company to make reservoirs and aqueducts. These of themselves produce no profit. Suppose the canal, by passing a reservoir, rendered it highly profitable: would the company be rateable for such an increase in value? Lord Ellenborough, in Rex v. The Leeds and Liverpool Canal Company (a), said, "The meaning of the clause of exemption was, that the land or space occupied by the canal should be liable to be taxed as it was before;" and Lawrence J. said, "As to the exemption itself, the object of the clause was to take care that when the company were engaging in a hazardous undertaking which was considered to be beneficial to the public, they should not be liable to any other taxes than those which the land they made use of in their undertaking was before liable to." That is inconsistent with a progressive value. In Rex v. The Grand Junction Canal Company (b) Bayley J. says, that the rate was imposed according to the value of the land "when first taken for the purposes of the canal." In Rex v. St. Peter the Great (c) Bayley J. says, that in some canal acts the clauses of exemption are so framed "as to leave land upon the same footing in this respect, as it was when first taken for the purposes of the canal." In Rex v. The Chelmer and Blackwater Navigation Company (d) Lord Tenterden considered that the object contemplated was, that no parish should "become a loser by the diminution of the value of rateable property within it, at whatever period of time such diminution might happen to take place." That is all which the Lord DENMAN C. J. I cannot think that there is any substantial ground of doubt as to any of the questions. As to the first, the exemption is, I think, incorporated in the two later statutes. It is not, however, necessary to detail the reasons for my opinion on this point, nor to point out the distinction between this case and that in which the certificate was given. As to the second question, if, as the appellants argue, the legislature meant that the land was to be estimated according to the value which it bore when taken for the purposes of the acts, I must say that it would have been much better that an estimate should have been put on the land by the legislature at the time; for it would now be a very difficult inquiry for the parish officers. But it is said that the words are clear: if they be, they are clear against the appellants. The words are, not at any higher value than other lands adjacent are or shall for the time being be rated. The legislature contemplated, not merely the time at which the act passed, but all the time during which the property was to be rated. If the value of the adjacent lands fluctuated, how could that of the lands taken for the canal be exempt from fluctuation? It is true that the section goes on to add, "and as the lands," &c. "would have been rateable in case the same had continued in their former state, and not been used for the purposes of the said navigation or undertaking." It does not prescribe that the land shall be rated at the value which it would have borne if the undertaking had never been carried into effect, but only at that which it would have borne if never used for the purposes of the act. The language of the clause is not critically or grammatically correct. But I think the meaning is, merely, that the land shall be rated as it would have been if it had remained in the hands of individuals. As to the cases cited, they have been very industriously collected, and very ingeniously commented upon; but the Judges who decided those cases were deciding on a different question. Where they say that the improved value is not to be taken into the estimate, they do not refer to the improvement in the value of the land as land, but to the improvement arising from its being used for the particular undertaking, and they decide against such improvement being liable to rate. Their attention was not directed to the distinction now suggested, though the expressions which they use certainly have the appearance of bearing the sense attributed to them. As to the third question, I do not know whether that too be not answered by what has already been said. The words certainly do not naturally bear the meaning contended for; and there is no reason for our introducing such a meaning. On the contrary, the parish and the neighbouring proprietors would be losers if their lands were to be rated on their improved value, but those used for the canal only on the old value. The result is that, though the appellants are right on the first question, the other two questions must be decided in favour of the order of sessions; and the order, therefore, must stand.

LITLEDAL J. As to the first point, I have no doubt. It seems to me that the later acts incorporate the the exemption given by the first. Allusions have been made to a case on which a certificate was sent from this Court. There the question was, whether a power given to proprietors within eight miles of the canal was, under the particular circumstances, continued with respect to an additional undertaking. I suppose that it would not be so continued; but that case has nothing to do with the present. It is not, however, necessary to go at length into the first question. As to the second, it does not admit of the slightest possible doubt. There might have been some doubt if the words "for the time being" had not been introduced; but these words shew that the future value was contemplated. It is now more than forty years since the act was passed: how could the original value be ascertained forty years hence? There certainly is more difficulty as to the third question. The case states that the value of the adjacent land has been increased by various circumstances, some of which are independent of the canal; and it is contended that the advance in value only which these circumstances have caused should be taken into the estimate. The last words of the 101st clause may create some doubt as to this. But I think we must take the improved value as it is. When the act passed, it was thought that tolls were rateable per se; the act therefore, in the first place, exempts the tolls from rate. Then, as to the part which follows, there have been cases in which the question has been whether, under such clauses as this, the value of the land was to be estimated as increased by the tolls; here the act says that the company are to be rated in respect of their lands, not as raised in value by the tolls, but as mere land, taken taken at the value of the adjacent lands. This is highly reasonable. The clause is indeed not accurately worded, and may give rise to some doubt. The phraseology varies throughout: the clause first speaks of "lands and grounds to be purchased or taken," and of "warehouses and other buildings to be erected or set up;" but afterwards it says that these are to be rated "as the lands, grounds, warehouses, and other buildings so to be purchased and taken, and erected, would have been rateable in case the same had continued in their former state." The buildings to be erected could not exist in any former state. We may, however, take the meaning to be, that all is to be estimated according to the value of adjacent lands and buildings. Then is that value to be taken at the present increased value or not? The increase is produced by the canal and other causes. But how can you discriminate? I think the meaning is, simply, that the estimate of the value is not to be increased by reason of the tolls.

PATTESON J. As to the first question, I think it must be answered in favour of the appellants. We do not know the precise ground of the case in which the certificate was given; it arose on the 128th section, which is not like the 101st. I think that the general provisions in the 101st section are incorporated in the later acts. As to the second question, I certainly cannot make sense of all the words; yet I think that the words approach nearer to sense than the words of such acts sometimes do. It is true, as Mr. Greaves remarks, that tolls were thought to be rateable at the time when the act passed. The meaning of the legislature was to exempt the tolls from rate, and to exempt the lands from being rated in respect of the tolls. In almost all the cases cited, the question was whether, in rating the premises, the additional value arising from the tolls was to be taken into consideration; certainly it is not to be so taken here. Mr. Greaves says that the variation of expression from the phrases, "at any time or times hereafter," and "from time to time," to the phrase "for the time being," shews that the last phrase does not refer to a future time. I think the phrases all mean the same thing. "For the time being" sometimes means identity of time: but it often means continuity; and that is, I think, the meaning here, "as they shall be rated from time to time." Then what is the value referred to? (His Lordship then read the 101st section.) As for the buildings to be erected, they had no "former state." But if the clause had stopped at the words "are or shall, for the time being, be rated," there could have been no doubt: and I think that the following words mean that the value is to be taken which the lands would have had in the hands of any other person. The second question, therefore, must be decided against the appellants. As to the third question, how can a man tell what the value would have been in the case supposed? That question, therefore, must be answered against the appellants.

WILLIAMS J. I am of the same opinion. First, as to the question of incorporation, I have no doubt whatever. The words themselves remove all difficulty. That unprofitable point, therefore, is in favour of the appellants. As to the second question, Mr. Greaves brought forward many cases to induce us to think that the proper proper time for fixing the value was that of the formation of the canal. All, however, turns upon the language of the particular act. One argument is sufficient, to my mind, to shew that it is impossible to suppose that the value was to be fixed as the appellants contend. How is the value of the adjacent lands to be estimated? Clearly by the fluctuating value; and that is the value assigned by the sessions. As to the third question, all the reasons applicable to the second apply there also, with this besides, that the test introduced is quite unmanageable. I do not know how it could be dealt with. The second and third questions must, therefore, be decided against the appellants.

An act of parliament empowered a canal company to construct certain canals and railroads, paying compensation to the

By an order of the Lord Chancellor, made in these causes, 9th March 1822, a case for the opinion of this Court was stated, substantially as follows:—

In 32 G. 3. an act of parliament passed (c. 102. antè, p. 620. and note (c) p. 627.), for making and maintaining certain navigable cuts or canals, owners of lands used; and also to make railroads to iron works, &c. within eight miles of the canals or railroads first mentioned; and it provided that, if the owners of certain species of property situate within eight miles from any part of the canals or railways before particularly described and authorized to be made, should think it expedient that railways should be made through the lands of other persons, for the purpose of conveying goods from the canals or railways before particularly described, and if the company should refuse to make such railways under the powers given them by the act, such owners might, at their own cost, make the railways, paying compensation to the proprietors of the lands over which they were to be made; and that the railways so made should be open to the public, on payment of such tolls as the company could demand.

A subsequent act incorporated a tramroad company, and gave them, or the canal company, power to make certain railways, and to take thereon the tolls authorized by the former act; and it provided, that the companies should have the same powers for recovering the tolls as were given by the first act; and that the several clauses, powers, authorities, regulations, limitations, exemptions, restrictions, privileges, penalties, forfeitures, punishments, and provisions therein contained, should, as far as the same would apply and the

In 37 G. 3. an act of parliament (c. 100. antè, p. 621.) passed, for extending the Monmouthshire canal navigation; and for explaining and amending the act first mentioned, for making the said canal.

In 42 G. 3. an act of parliament (c. cxv. local and personal, public, antè, p. 622.) passed, for making and maintaining certain railways to communicate with the Monmouthshire canal navigation; and for explaining and amending the two statutes previously mentioned. Either party was to be at liberty to refer to these three acts.

The tramroad authorized to be made by the last of these acts was completed some years since, and is called the Sirhowy Tramroad. It no where communicates or forms a junction with the canals or tramroads made under the act of 32 G. 3. John Jones, Esquire, was, at the time of making the application and request hereinafter mentioned, and still is, the owner of certain lands called Tir Lewis David, containing unopened coal mines. These are situate within much less than eight miles of part of that proportion of the Sirhowy tramroad which is below a place called The Nine Mile Point, mentioned in stat. 42 G. 3. c. cxv., and are within eight miles of the main canal made in pursuance of stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102.

The said John Jones deemed it expedient that a railway or waggon road should be made from his lands for the purpose of conveying the coals in his lands to a part of the Sirhowy tramroad which is immediately below The Nine Mile Point, over, through, and along the lands of several other persons, owners of lands situate between his lands and the said Nine Mile Point, and who refused to consent to the making of the said railway or waggon road; and he, being advised that the provisions of section 128. (antè, p. 627. note (c)) of stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102. were to be considered as incorporated into stat. 42 G. 3. c. cxv., so as to authorise the making of such railway or waggon road from his lands to any part of the said Sirhowy tramroad within eight miles of his lands, made an application and request in writing to the company of proprietors of the Monmouthshire canal navigation, at a general assembly or meeting, &c., to make such railway or waggon road. circumstances which became unimportant from the decision of the Court, and as to which no opinion was pronounced.)

The questions for the opinion of the Court were,

Whether the provisions of the 128th section of the 32 G. 3. are, by the force and effect of any clause, enactment, or words, in the act of the 42 G. 3., to be considered as so incorporated into and made part of the provisions of the act of the 42 G. 3., as that the whole, or any and what part or parts, of the Sirhowy tramroad is or are to be taken and considered as a railway to which the said provisions are applicable, so as to authorize the making of such railways or waggon roads to the said Sirhowy tramroad, or such part or parts thereof, from any lands within eight miles thereof, as are authorized to be made by the said 128th section, to any of the railways mentioned in the act of the 32 G. 3., from any lands situate within eight miles of such last-mentioned railways; and, if the Judges of this Court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then, &c. (The other questions became unimportant, from the decision on the first.)

The case was argued at the sittings in banc, after Hilary term (February 20th) 1823.

Puller, for the Sirhowy Tramroad Company and Mr. Homfray, contended that stat. 42 G. 3. c. cxv. s. 3. applied only to powers to be exercised by the companies.

Campbell, for Mr. Jones, contended that the objects of the three acts were the same, and that the intention of the legislature was to place the works executed under each of the acts under the same circumstances with respect to the lands in the neighbourhood; that the words of stat. 42 G. 3. c. cxv. s. 3. were sufficiently ample to effect this; and that, if the 128th section of stat. 32 G. 3. c. 102. had been inserted, mutatis mutandis, in stat. 42 G. 3. c. cxv., the power now claimed would have been expressly conferred.

This case has been argued before us by counsel; and we are of opinion that the provisions of the 128th section of the 32 G. 3. are not, by force and effect of any clause, enactment, or words, in the act of 42 G. 3., to be considered as so incorporated into and made part of the provisions of the act of the 42 G. 3., as that the whole, or any parts, of the Sirhowy tramroad is to be considered a railway to which the said provisions are applicable, so as to authorise making of such railways or waggon roads to the said Sirhowy tramroad, or any part thereof from any lands within eight miles thereof, as are authorized to be made by the said 128th section, to any of the railways mentioned in the said act of the 32 G. 3., from any lands situate within eight miles of such last-mentioned railways, unless the lands from which such railways are to be made to the Sirhowy tramroad are within eight miles from some part of

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Eldon) subsequently made the following observations, which were handed with the certificate to Mr. Justice Bayley: —

“ This matter has come again before me, Mr. Fuller and Mr. Campbell attending with the Chancery counsel. On neither side are they able to state what is meant by the words scored under” [printed in italics]. “ If they except any railways to be made to the Sirhowy tramroad out of the negative answer contained previously in the certificate, then, as to such railways, the other questions in the case stated, which have not been answered, should receive an answer from the Judges, but are not noticed in the certificate at all. If the words scored under do not import that some railways are such as do not fall within the preceding negative answer, what is the exact meaning of the words?”

Mr. Justice Bayley's answer was as follows: —

“ The Judges before whom the case of the Sirhowy tramroad was argued were of opinion that the Sirhowy tramroad was not under 42 G. 3. made a new terminus, so as to warrant railways upon all lands within eight miles thereof; and that the 42 G. 3. gave no right to make a railway to the Sirhowy tramroad upon lands which before that act were not liable to that burthen.

“ But, as there might be lands within eight miles of the termini specified in the 32 G. 3. (viz. the canals and the railways specially described in that act), and railways over those lands to those termini might touch upon or fall in with the Sirhowy tramroad, the qualification at the end of our certificate was intended to intimate that such railways as, independently of the 42 G. 3., could have been made under 32 G. 3., might still be made.”

The KING against The Inhabitants of ST. MARY, LEICESTER.

On appeal against a removal, the respondents proved that the pauper was born in the appellant parish; the appellants proved that his mother's maiden settlement was in a different parish; but neither side gave any evidence of the father's settlement, or of any attempt made to ascertain it:

Held that, as against the birth settlement relied upon by the respondents, proof of the mother's maiden settlement was sufficient to invalidate the order.

ON an appeal against an order of two justices, removing John Cuthbert from the parish of Sweystone in Leicestershire to the parish of St. Mary in the borough of Leicester, in the same county, the sessions confirmed the order, subject to the following case.

The respondents, on the hearing of the appeal, proved that the pauper was born in the appellant parish; which was met by the appellants proving that the pauper's mother, before her marriage with his father, acquired a settlement by hiring and service in the parish of St. Martin in the borough and county aforesaid. The court of quarter sessions confirmed the order, on the ground that no evidence was offered to shew that the pauper's father had no settlement.

Humfrey and Burnaby in support of the order of sessions. It must be contended, on the part of the appellants, that every settlement, however remote, as that of a grandmother, for instance, may be relied upon, without tracing the settlement of the father of the pauper. In Rex v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green (a), it is said by Wilmot J., "The positive law in these cases of settlements, is that the child's settlement follows that of its father, if the father can be found; and that no recourse shall be had to the mother's settlement, till that of the father can be traced no further." The party, therefore, who insists on the settlement which cannot be set up till that of the father has been enquired into, is the party bound to trace that of the father. Here the appellants call upon the sessions to presume that the father had no settlement; whereas the presumption is that every person has a settlement. The necessity of adhering to the rule laid down in Rex v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green (a), appears from the liability to surprise which there would be if it were enough, in order to meet a birth settlement, to shew any settlement, however remote. In Rex v. Harborton (b) it was said by the Court, that evidence of the wife's maiden settlement (in a question as to the settlement of wife and daughters) was prima facie sufficient, and that it lay upon the other side to rebut it by giving evidence of the husband's settlement in a different parish. But Rex v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green (a), was not cited there: and the actual decision may be explained on other grounds; for, there, unless the wife's settlement was effectual, no settlement at all appeared; but here the birth settlement was proved. In Rex v. St. Mary, Beverley (c), it was held that proof of the maiden settlement of a married woman was not, of itself, sufficient to establish her settlement in the appellant parish; but, there, proof was given that the husband was born in another parish, though it could not be discovered what the other parish was; and there, also, Rex v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green (a), was not cited. In Rex v. Westersham (d) the maiden settlement of a wife was held good, as to herself and her child, upon its being shewn that the husband had run away, and that his settlement was not known, which satisfied the requisite that the father's settlement must be traced, or evidence be given of a reasonable attempt to discover it, before the mother's settlement be resorted to. If this order were quashed, the result would be conclusive as between the two parishes; and, if hereafter the husband's settlement should be discovered to be in the appellant parish, the respondents could not avail themselves of it.

Hildyard and G. T. White, contra. The order of removal is wrong, upon any supposition. If the father had a settlement, then the removal to the birth settlement was wrong; if he had not, then the child's settlement is that of the mother. The parish removing is thus the party upon whom it lay to trace the father's settlement. But, again, as the father's settlement was not shewn, it is as if he had none; this is, indeed, the very principle upon which the removal to the birth settlement must be defended. The appellants are entitled to have the order, removing to the birth settlement, quashed, if either father or mother had a settlement; and they have proved one alternative which entitles them to succeed, whether the other be true or not. Rex v. St. Mary, Beverley (a), shews that here the removing parish, being bound to prove the last legal settlement, are the party on whom it lies to support, if possible, the birth settlement, by proving the absence of settlement by parentage. In Rex v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green (b), the first husband's settlement was expressly found to be not known; and the second husband had no settlement: it did not become a question which was the party on whom the onus of tracing the husband's settlement lay. The appellants could not here be called upon to disprove every possible species of settlement which the father might have had. In Rex v. St. Mary, Beverley (a), the authorities are discussed by Bayley J.; and he afterwards says, "They prove at the utmost that where there is no sufficient evidence of any settlement in the husband, and where the only settlement as to which there is any, is the wife's maiden settlement, the wife may be removed to that settlement." The general rule is that proof of a negative is not required: this case is not among the exceptions to that rule. In Rex v. Wakefield (b) Le Blanc J. said, "The place of birth is the weakest evidence of settlement;" and thus the proof of the mother's settlement here destroyed the prima facie case of the respondents. [Williams J. referred to Rex v. Whisley (c).] That case shews that proof of the birth settlement is "sufficient to throw the burthen on the other side, of proving a different place of settlement by parentage;" here the appellants have given a proof of settlement by parentage, which is sufficient till it is met. The rule laid down in Nolan on the Poor Laws is (d), "Where the father has not a known settlement before his child becomes chargeable, that which the mother had previous to her marriage is communicated in the same manner, and subject to the same rules."

Lord DENMAN C. J. My first impression was that, upon the authority of the rule laid down in Rex v. St.

Matthew, Bethnal Green (a), it was incumbent upon the appellants to prove either the father's settlement, or that inquiries had been made as to his settlement and that none had been found; neither of which has been done. But the respondents rely upon the birth settlement. If the father had a settlement in the same place, they should have shewn it; but they rely upon the prima facie case of the birth. That is good till a settlement by parentage be shewn. Here, that is shewn by proof of the mother's settlement. It is argued that the mother's settlement cannot be taken to be that of the child, till the fact of the father's settlement be disproved: but that is not so here, because the mother's is good as against a birth settlement.

LITLEDALE J. The respondents, without giving any account of the parents, shew a prima facie settlement by birth. The appellants, to get rid of that, shew a settlement in one parent, the mother: but neither party gives any proof as to the father. The father's settlement would displace that of the mother; but it would also displace the birth settlement. How, then, does the case stand? It may be presumed, indeed, that every man had a settlement; but, if the father had one, it would displace the settlement relied upon by the respondents, as that of the mother will do in the absence of the father's settlement.

PATTESON J. The birth settlement is the lowest and weakest. If you shew a better, you get rid of that:

the birthplace is the place of settlement, because no better settlement can be found. Here, a better is found.

WILLIAMS J. I accede to the view of the case taken by Mr. Hildyard. How do the respondents make good a settlement by birth? Only by supposing that the father has no settlement. EJECTMENT for a barn, stable, and land. The cause was tried before Lord Denman C. J. at the Winchester Summer assizes, 1834. The lessor of the plaintiff, Chandler, claimed as trustee under an annuity deed for the yearly payment of 20*l.*, executed by the defendant in 1826. The defence was, that the deed was void, not having been properly enrolled pursuant to stat. 53 G. 3. c. 141. s. 2. In answer, it was alleged that the deed came within sect. 10., which exempts from the operation of the act any annuity secured upon freehold

In ejectment by grantee of an annuity against the grantor, for premises on which the annuity was secured, it appeared that no memorial had been enrolled. The lessor of the plaintiff contended that none was necessary, by sect. 10. of the Annuity Act, 53 G. 3. c. 141., the premises being of greater value than the annuity, in proof of which he relied on a clause in the annuity deed, wherein the defendant covenanted that the premises were of more than sufficient value to answer and pay the annuity. The defendant offered evidence to prove that the premises were not of such value when the annuity was granted.

Quære, whether a covenant, as above, is a declaration which estops the party making it from afterwards disputing in an action the fact covenanted for. But, assuming that it were so in other cases, or copyhold lands, &c. "of equal or greater annual value than the said annuity, over and above any other annuity, and the interest of any principal sum charged or secured thereon," &c. To prove this, the plaintiff relied upon the following covenant by the defendant in the deed in question. "And moreover, that now, and at the time of the sealing and delivering these presents, the said barn, stable, buildings, pieces or parcels of land, hereditaments and premises hereby demised or intended so to be, are of more than sufficient annual value to answer and pay the said annuity or clear yearly sum of 20*l.* hereby granted, over and above all reprises, charges and incumbrances whatsoever, payable out of, or affecting the same." For the defendant it was urged that this covenant was not evidence of the value; for that an annuity deed could not be exempted from the operation of the statute by a clause which the parties thought proper to insert in the deed itself, perhaps with that very intention. The objection was over-ruled. A witness was also called, who proved that the defendant had represented the value as exceeding 20*l.* to a party acting on behalf of the lessor of the plaintiff, Chandler, and had referred that agent to another person, who said the statement was correct. It was then proposed, on behalf of the defendant, to prove that the actual value of the premises in 1826 was below 10*l.*; but it was urged, on the other side, that his covenant estopped him from shewing this. The Lord Chief Justice, however, admitted the evidence, giving leave to move upon the point; and he left the case to the jury upon the question of value. The jury found that the premises were not worth 20*l.* a year, and gave a verdict for the defendant. In Michaelmas term, 1834, Coleridge Serjt. obtained a rule to shew shew cause why a verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff.

Erle (with whom were Bingham and Dampier) now shewed cause. The covenant that this property was of a certain value, cannot be deemed equivalent to a direct allegation that it was so. But, assuming this to be otherwise, although in ordinary cases a party is estopped from giving evidence in direct contradiction to the statement of his own deed, that rule cannot prevail here, where an act of parliament has been manifestly infringed, and might be altogether evaded by means of covenants like the present, if they created an estoppel. Saunders v. Wright (a) shews that the grantor of an annuity may prove the land to be of inadequate value, though by evidence contrary to his own representations, and even to the recital of his deed. A covenant, for a purpose against law, is void and does not bind; Stepp. Touchst. 163. Where the consideration of a bond is illegal (as simony, usury, or compounding of felony), the defendant may plead the fact, although there be a different and legal consideration recited in the bond; Bull. N. P. 178. In Hill v. The Manchester Waterworks Company (b), it was considered clear that a deed does not estop where the matter relied upon as creating the estoppel has been introduced to effect a fraud or a purpose contrary to act of parliament. In Paxton v. Popham (c), where it was observed in argument that in cases of usury, gaming, and stock-jobbing, a bond is constantly framed, stating a legal, but untrue consideration, yet the courts always allow the true one to be shewn, Le Blanc J. said, "This has frequently occurred in cases of annuity transactions, where, as in cases of usury, goods have been given to the obligors instead of money, as stated in the condition of the bonds." The Court here called upon

Manning, contra. The doctrine in Hill v. The Manchester Waterworks Company (a) might have applied if the annuity act had required every deed to be registered. But it requires registration in those cases only, where the property is below a certain value: and, therefore, unless the grantee knew that the property was so here, there is, in him, no fraud or evasion of the act, and, consequently, the estoppel as against him ought not to be defeated. The representation made to him, and which he believed, was, that the property was of sufficient value to answer the annuity. If he had known the contrary, he had no motive for permitting the deed not to be registered, as the expense of registration would have been borne by the grantor. The cases, in which statements have been inserted in deeds as a colour for usury or other illegal transactions between the parties, have no application here. If this had been an action of covenant, and the defendant had pleaded the want of a memorial, the plaintiff, to make the estoppel conclusive, must have replied it, Vooght v. Winck (b); but, in an action where there is no opportunity of pleading the estoppel, it is conclusive if raised by evidence under the general issue.

LITLEDALE J. I am of opinion that the defendant was not precluded from offering this evidence. It is not necessary to decide whether this covenant amounted to an estoppel or not. At all events it could not have that operation here. The effect of that which took place was to prevent the deed from being registered. The parties were in fact doing something by which the act would be evaded. It is urged that the lessor of the plaintiff had no motive for permitting the deed not to be registered. I cannot say how this may have been; the motive may have been kind feeling towards the grantor, and a desire to save him expense; but, however this may be, if the grantee chose to rely upon the accounts given him by the grantor, he must be bound by the consequence. It was his duty to inquire more strictly as to the value: if he had done so, the result would probably have been a discovery of that which now appears by the verdict. The effect of his omission was to prevent the enrolment of the deed, and any inquiries to which that might have led.

(a) 2 B. & Ad. 544.

(b) 2 B. & Ad. 662.

PATTESON J. I do not say whether, in a different case, this covenant would have been an estoppel or not. But the question here arises on a statute which says that an annuity deed, if no memorial is enrolled, shall be void, unless it falls under certain provisions, contained in the tenth section. To enforce the deed, where there is no memorial, the parties must shew that it comes within one of these provisions; in the present case, that the lands are of equal annual value with the annuity, or greater. To establish that here, the defendant refers to a covenant, by which, as he says, it is stated that the lands are of such value. But that is not sufficient for the purpose. If it were held so, an instrument which the parties might choose to prepare would defeat the statute from beginning to end. They insert a covenant that the land is of the requisite value; value; they might equally well put in a statement that the annuity was given by marriage settlement, or without regard to pecuniary consideration, and then contend that the grantor was estopped to shew the contrary. It is argued that the grantee could have no motive for allowing the enrolment not to take place. I cannot say what the motive may have been here, but many reasons may be suggested; as to save expense, to avoid publicity, or to frustrate inquiry by persons who may subsequently wish to have annuities secured on the same land. The security of such persons is one object of the statute. It could not be contended, on motion to set the deed aside, that the grantor was estopped from taking this objection; and I do not see why it should be more available here.

WILLIAMS J. Hill v. The Manchester Water Works Company (a) is an authority against the plaintiff, because it was held there that the pleas might have been an answer if they had disclosed that the bonds were given for an immoral purpose, or in contravention of a statute (b), or of public policy. The judgments of the Court proceed expressly on the ground that the pleas do not, upon the face of them, present any sufficient statement of that kind, and are therefore no defence. Here, the evidence in question was offered to shew that the act of parliament had been evaded; and it was admissible for that purpose.

LORD DENMAN C. J. I should not have reserved the point, but for the advantage which the grantor of the annuity was probably about to derive from his own wrong. I doubt whether a covenant can operate as an estoppel at all; but at any rate this covenant could not have the effect of preventing the defendant from shewing that the deed was not within the clause of exemption.

CASE for slander. The cause was tried before Patteson J. at the Spring assizes at Winchester, 1835, and the plaintiff had a verdict for 50*l.* In the ensuing term a rule nisi was obtained for a new trial, upon affidavits. The material facts, as stated in the affidavits for and against the rule, were as follows:—

The slanderous words complained of imputed to the plaintiff that she had been dismissed from a service for certain improper conduct. The summons was served 18th September 1834: defendant appeared on the 27th. The declaration, laying the venue in Hampshire, was delivered January 30th 1835, and a plea demanded on the 31st. Time to plead was obtained, on summons, February 7th, on the usual terms in country causes; viz. to plead issuably, rejoin gratis, and take short notice of trial, if necessary, for the next assizes. A summons for further time was served Feb. 11th, and a week granted, on the former terms, Feb. 12th. On the 19th, at half-past seven in the evening, the defendants' agents delivered the pleas, filling twenty folios, to the plaintiff's agents, who, on the next day, sent a copy to the plaintiff's attorney at Ringwood, Hants. He received it on the 21st. The pleas contained, besides the general issue, justifications, in which it was stated that the plaintiff had been turned away from the service of a Mrs. Osey for the improper conduct imputed by the words complained of. This rendered it necessary for the plaintiff's attorney to make certain inquiries, particularly at Southampton, where Mrs. Osey lived. The answer to those inquiries was received February 25th; and the plaintiff's attorney, upon that day (which he stated to have been the earliest possible time after the justification was ascertained to be untrue), wrote to his agents in London to prepare the replication, issue, and notice of trial. The agents obtained a draft of the replication, which was de injuriâ, on the 27th, and on that day gave the draft of the issue to a clerk to be copied. The issue extended to sixty folios, and was therefore not ready till the evening of the 27th. It was delivered, with notice of trial, to the defendants' agents at a quarter-past, or (as they stated) half-past, seven. In the morning of the 27th the plaintiff's agents had told the agents for the defendants that the issue was engrossing and would be delivered, with notice of trial, before post-time if possible, but that they might write to their client and inform him that the issue and notice would be delivered that day. The defendants' attorney lived at Salisbury. On the 28th the defendants' agents told the plaintiff's agents that they should treat the notice as a nullity, to which the latter replied that they should send down the record that night, and should rely upon the notice of trial as being sufficient under the new rules of Court. They did accordingly send down the record and jury process, and copies of the issue and notice of trial, by that night's mail to the plaintiff's attorney, who received them on the 1st of March. No summons was taken out for setting aside the notice of trial.

It appeared, by the affidavits in support of the rule, that, on the morning of February 28th, the defendants' attorney at Salisbury received a letter from his agents, stating that the plaintiff had given no notice of trial; and the attorney, in consequence, subpoenaed no witnesses. On the 1st of March, which was Sunday, he received another letter from his agents, stating that notice of trial had been given, but he considered it then too late to subpoena his witnesses, several of them, whose evidence was material, living in different places, and many at a considerable distance from Salisbury and Winchester.

The cause was tried on the 3d of March, the commission day of the assizes, when the plaintiff gave the evidence which had been inquired for, as above stated, after the delivery of the pleas. The defendant Penfold and his attorney were in Court till the verdict was given, but made no defence, or application to put off the trial. The defendants' attorney now deposed that they did not appear, in consequence of his belief that the notice was improper: and he and the defendant Penfold made affidavit of merits.

Dampier now shewed cause, and contended that the notice of trial was sufficiently early, under the circumstances. By the rule of Court, Hil. 2 W. 4. I. 58. (a) "short notice of trial shall, in country causes, be taken to mean four days." That rule is peremptory; Lawson v. Robinson (b). And, by rule viii., of the same series (c), the days must be reckoned exclusively of the first, and inclusively of the last. Here the notice was given on the 27th of February, for the 3d of March. And by the rule of Court, Hil. 2 W. 4. I. 50. (d), "service of rules and orders, and notices, if made before nine at night, shall be deemed good, but not if made after that hour." The defendants obtained time to plead upon the very terms now complained of; and an extension of that time was granted them afterwards. If, nevertheless, they felt themselves prejudiced by the notice of trial, they might have applied to a judge at chambers.

Kelly, contra. The shortness of the notice arose from the plaintiff's own delay. At least the defendants should have been allowed twenty-four hours to rejoin. The four days here include a Sunday and the day of the trial. The terms, on which time to plead was granted, were, to take short notice of trial, "if necessary." The short notice here insisted upon would not have been necessary if the plaintiff had used due diligence. The time taken for replying was much more than could be necessary for a replication of "de injuriâ."

LORD DENMAN C. J. On the whole, the trial does not appear satisfactory, though neither party has much to complain of. The rule must be absolute; the costs to abide the event of the next trial.

ASSUMPSIT for use and occupation of a dwelling-house and land. Plea, that the defendants did not use and occupy, &c. The particular of demand was for rent, from December 25th 1832, to March 25th 1834, of premises formerly occupied by George Hawkins, and since by the defendants, assignees of G. H. On the trial before Lord Denman C. J., at the Hampshire summer assizes 1834, the material facts appeared to be as follows:—Hawkins took the premises of the plaintiff from year to year, commencing at Midsummer 1831, at a rent payable quarterly, under a written agreement. He carried on business as a grocer in the house, and underlet the land. In 1832, being in difficulties, he executed a deed of assignment to the defendants of all his stock in trade, household goods, debts, estate and effects, in trust to sell for the benefit of his creditors. No express mention was made in the deed of his interest in the premises demised to him by the plaintiff. The defendants executed the deed on the 20th of December 1832. Hawkins's family continued on the premises a short time after the assignment, carrying on the business and accounting to the defendants. On the 22d (Hawkins and his family having then gone away) the assignees put in a shopman who continued to carry on the business, accounting to them, for about a week. No new stock came in. On the 29th the shop was shut up; but the man slept at the house for the purpose of taking care of the assigned property, and which were accordingly sold on the premises; and that, under a mistake of the law, they paid rent to the landlord for the half year in which the assignment took place.

Where a tennor assigns his goods, estate and effects to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, Quære, whether the trustees have the same option of accepting or rejecting the term, with assignees of a bankrupt; and whether they can divest themselves of it without a formal disclaimer?

But, although the assignment be sufficient to vest the term in the trustees unless disclaimed, and they do not disclaim, assumpsit for use and occupation cannot be maintained against them without proof that they have actually occupied.

It is not sufficient for this purpose to prove that they placed persons temporarily upon the premises to take care of and sell goods

the goods, till the following February, when the property remaining on the premises was sold by auction, by Kennett's order. On the 19th of March, 1833, Kennett wrote to the plaintiff as follows: — “Sir, I beg to say I am prepared to settle the half year’s rent for Hawkins’s house, which the trustees consider themselves accountable for: please say if I shall wait on you this morning, or whether you wish to go into the house before I deliver you the keys. I am,” &c. The plaintiff wrote in reply (March 19th), that he was ready to receive the rent, but had nothing to do with the keys till Midsummer 1834. He added, in another note on the same day, “I beg leave to inform you that if the trustees see fit (any time betwixt this and Saturday) to offer an acceptable proposal, I may thereby be induced to relieve them very considerably as to the tenancy with which they have burthened themselves.” On the 23d, Kennett, having in the mean time tendered the keys, which were refused, wrote as follows: “Dear Sir, not having an opportunity of consulting my partner trustee on the subject of replying to your proposition, I take upon myself to offer, for the trustees, half a year’s rent, without prejudice, in lieu of holding possession such time as they may be liable.” On the 25th, the plaintiff not having agreed to this proposal, Kennett paid the rent up to that day, and tendered the keys, which were again refused. On the 29th of January 1834 the plaintiff’s solicitor gave notice to the defendants to repair the premises, threatening an action if any damage ensued from nonrepair.

King, the auctioneer who sold the goods by order of Kennett, stated that, a few days before they were sold, the plaintiff told him that the premises were for sale, and asked him to procure a purchaser; and he further deposed posed, that in January 1834, in a conversation respecting the sale of them, the plaintiff gave King the selling price, but desired him to keep secret his having done so.

On behalf of the defendants, it was first contended that there must be a nonsuit, inasmuch as the general words used in the deed of assignment were not sufficient to pass Hawkins's interest to the assignees; in answer to which Carter v. Warne (a) was cited. The defendants' counsel then submitted to the jury that no sufficient evidence appeared of an occupation, or contract to occupy. The Lord Chief Justice, after observing that there was no evidence of an actual occupation, except the sending in of a shopman by Kennett for a week, left it to the jury to say whether there had been a contract by which the defendants had adopted the tenancy. He explained this by asking whether the jury thought the defendants had so conducted themselves as to lead the plaintiff reasonably to believe, and whether he did believe, that they intended to become tenants upon the terms of Hawkins's agreement; and he relied strongly upon King's evidence of the conversation in 1834, as shewing that this was not really the plaintiff's own understanding of the transaction. The defendants had a verdict.

Coleridge Serjt., in the ensuing term, moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. The question upon the evidence was not, whether the parties considered themselves as entering into a particular contract, but, whether, if the jury believed the evidence, the conduct of the defendants had not amounted to an actual taking of possession: Thomas v. Pemberton (a), Hanson v. Stevenson (b), Clark v. Hume (c). [Taunton J. The case of assignees of a bankrupt does not illustrate the present, because they are enabled by statute to elect whether they will accept a lease held by the bankrupt.] The difference is in favour of the plaintiff. A rule nisi was granted, against which

Barstow now shewed cause. The direction was right. No term vested in the assignees by the deed of assignment; that made no mention of the leasehold interest, or of any thing to be done by the assignees except selling the stock. Nor was there any term, which could vest by the deed. [Littledale J. A tenancy from year to year is a term.] But, at all events, it was for the plaintiff to shew that the defendants had done some act which amounted to a substitution of themselves for Hawkins. (He then commented on the facts, with reference to this point.) [Patteson J. Assuming that the legal interest once passed to the defendants, is there any authority to shew that trustees for the benefit of creditors may elect to take or refuse a lease, like assignees of a bankrupt? Lord Denman C. J. referred to the summing up of Lord Tenterden in Carter v. Warne (d), as recognising such a right.] In the present deed the conveyance is only of stock, goods, and debts, specifically, the mention of these being followed by general words. At most it can only be said that this might or might not pass the leasehold interest. The jury were to say whether or not the assignees meant to accept it: they had done no act of acceptance, and there was strong evidence that the plaintiff did not believe them to have adopted the tenancy. The whole difficulty upon the defendants arises from their having honestly paid the rent up to Lady-day, which they were not bound to do.

Manning, contra. The defendants have decided this case against themselves, by paying the rent to Lady-day 1835. The words of the assignment do not materially differ from those of the deed in Carter v. Warne (a), which was held clearly sufficient to pass the leasehold property; and the case was cited to this point at the trial. But the assumption of Lord Tenterden there, that trustees to whom a term passes by such a deed have the same power of accepting or refusing the term with assignees of a bankrupt, is questionable. At common law, a term assigned, as in this case, vests in the assignee unless disclaimed. But the interest which assignees of a bankrupt take is not at common law, nor does it result from the act of an assignor. The statute law takes the property out of the bankrupt, and vests it in the assignees, sub modo. The object for which it vests, namely a rateable distribution for the benefit of creditors, is defined by the act itself. The assignees are not bound to accept a property not available for that object; as is clearly the case, for example, where the bankrupt is obligee of a bond for the benefit of another person: so it is also if the property would be damnosa hæreditas; and the assignees are allowed a reasonable time to ascertain whether it would be so or not. These are statutory rules, and do not apply to the case of trustees for the benefit of creditors. And, even if they did, the trustees in this case have taken the property to themselves. The auction in February 1833 was not for the purpose of ascertaining whether the lease could be rendered profitable, but for that of selling the stock. The house was used then by the trustees, as a warehouse for the goods. And further; Lord Tenterden's language in Carter v. Warne (a) is that, if assignees have acted "so as to render the premises of less value to the landlord, they must be considered as having taken to them;" which means, not if the assignees have damaged the premises, but if they have done any thing by which the landlord is put in a worse situation as to the disposal of them. Here the landlord would have been in a better situation for obtaining a new tenant, if the defendants had given up the premises at Christmas 1832, by which time they might have ascertained that it would not suit them to continue the holding. Even, therefore, if the present conveyance had stood upon the footing of an assignment in bankruptcy, the defendants would have been liable. But in this case the effect of the assignment would have been, without any act on the part of the assignees, to vest the property in them until disclaimer. And, supposing that a disclaimer might be made in the informal manner here attempted, a man cannot disclaim a property in part, and adopt it in part, as the defendants seek to do here. The property having vested in them by the deed, they have sold the goods and used the premises for the purpose of the sale. They have, then, taken to the premises; and they have rendered themselves liable in an action for use and occupation. [Lord Dennan C. J. Suppose Kennett had said, "I will send my servant to the premises, and he will look after the sale," and that had been done with the landlord's consent, would it have been a taking possession? What passed here is equivalent to that. A sale of goods by auction upon the premises is a proceeding well known. Patteson J. In Carter v. Warne (a) Lord Tenterden thought the terms of the deed sufficient to pass the lease; but still that it was a question of fact for the jury, whether the defendants had so dealt with the property as to make themselves assignees of it. According to you, the interest vested in the assignees by the mere assignment, so that covenant would have lain against them if the lease had been by deed: whether use and occupation lies is a different question.] The doctrine of Lord Tenterden in Carter v. Warne (a) was new, and contrary to the now recognised principles of law. It was not questioned, because the general effect of the summing up, and the verdict, were in favour of the party who would otherwise have taken the objection.

LITLEDALE J. I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. I agree with Mr. Manning, that an assignment at common law charges the assignee with the premises unless he disclaims. But the question here is, whether an action for use and occupation lies (b). The defendants became assignees of a yearly term in the premises, but did they actually enter and take possession? Mr. Manning contends that they did so; but it was a question for the jury, whether in fact they occupied the premises as tenants, or merely for the purpose of selling the goods. If they took to the premises under the assignment, use and occupation lies; if they merely used them to sell the goods, it does not necessarily follow, in point of law, that they are liable in this form of action. Perhaps an action of debt might lie, the declaration stating that the term was assigned to the defendants; but, in an action for use and occupation, it must be shewn that the defendants in fact occupied. The question was for the jury, and was rightly left.

PATTESON J. I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary to say whether by this deed the term became vested in the assignees unless they disclaimed; or whether the opinion of Lord Tenterden, as to the vesting of a term under such circumstances, be a wrong one; though it is a new proposition to me, that, where property is assigned by deed to a trustee, the assignee can repudiate it. But I view this as the case of an action for use and occupation. No person can be sued in that form who does not use and occupy. Perhaps an action of debt might be maintained as has been suggested by my brother Littledale; but not an action for use and occupation, unless an actual occupation were proved. That was a question for the jury. And, as to the facts (his Lordship here commented on the evidence, and stated that, in his opinion, the acts of the defendants, as proved, were most reasonably attributable to the intention of making what they could of the goods). Then, was the case properly left to the jury? I see no misdirection. My Lord Chief Justice left it to the jury to say whether the defendants had held themselves out to the plaintiff as intending to continue the tenancy on the former terms; and whether the plaintiff so understood their intention.

tention. If possession was taken by them on such an understanding, a new tenancy was commenced, independent of the assignment; and if they occupied on such a tenancy, they could not give up the term without notice to quit. It has been urged that the question to the jury should have been, whether the conduct of the defendants did not amount to an actual taking of possession. If that mean, whether, in point of law, the result of their conduct was not such, the question was not for a jury. If it mean, whether the parties so understood the transaction, that question was, in effect, left. On the question as to use and occupation, Nation v. Tozer (a) is a strong authority. There it was held that, although one executor had entered and taken possession, his co-executor was not liable in action for use and occupation, no occupation in fact being proved against him, and the act of one executor not being for this purpose the act of both.

WILLIAMS J. I am of the same opinion. The case was submitted to the jury perhaps more favourably to the plaintiff than was necessary.

LORD DENMAN C. J. It gives me great satisfaction that we are enabled to maintain this verdict, because otherwise the plaintiff would take an undue advantage of very honourable conduct on the part of the defendants. They took the premises only for the purpose of selling the goods. Their letter to the plaintiff, offering the rent and keys, was written under a mistake of the law; and he in his answer should have informed them of their

COPELAND against NEVILL.

To obtain an order for entering an appearance under stat. 2 W. 4. c. 39. s. 3., it is not sufficient to state on affidavit that "diligent inquiry" has been made to find the defendant and his property; but the way in which inquiry has been made must be described, to satisfy the Court that proper means have been used to serve and execute the writ.

S. B. HARRISON moved to enter an appearance for the defendant, under stat. 2 W. 4. c. 39. s. 3. It was stated on affidavit that, a distringas having issued against the defendant to compel his appearance in the suit, an officer of the sheriff of Middlesex went to a house which he understood to be the dwelling-house of the defendant, for the purpose of executing the writ, and was informed by a man servant on the premises that the defendant and his family had recently left the house, and that there were no effects or property belonging to the defendant on the premises. The officer deposed that he had made "diligent inquiry" to find the defendant, in order to serve him with a copy of the writ; but was unable to find him, or discover his abode, or any goods or chattels belonging to him. The sheriff returned non est inventus, and nulla bona. The clerk to the plaintiff's attorney deposed that he believed, from information he had received, that the defendant had absconded to avoid proceedings at law by his creditors. No appearance had been entered in this action.

ASSUMPSIT. The first count stated that whereas, by a certain agreement or instrument in writing, made heretofore, to wit, 14th of May 1832, and dated that day, the said defendants jointly and separately promised to pay unto the plaintiff or her order the sum of 50*l.*, in the parts and proportions, on the several days; and at the times, thereunder mentioned, being for value received by sundry household goods, &c., specified in an inventory &c. thereunto annexed, by way of instalments, and, that all instalments should cease at plaintiff's death. Plaintiff assumed, the first count being on the instrument, and calling it, in the declaration, an agreement or instrument in writing, except where the above language of the instrument itself was set out in the declaration. Defendants pleaded that they did not make the promissory note mentioned in the first count, as there alleged: Held, that the instrument was not a promissory note, as it created only a contingent liability; that the language used in the declaration did not authorise the defendants to call it a promissory note; and, consequently, that the plea was bad on special demurrer.

2. There was a second count on an account stated. The defendants pleaded first as above; without commencing the plea by actionem non, or expressly confining it to the first count (except by the language of the traverse as above); and they also pleaded to the last count expressly. Semble, per Littledale and Patteson Js., that the first plea was in form pleaded to the whole declaration, and was therefore bad for not answering the second count.

in manner and form following, that is to say, the sum of 5*l.*, part of the said sum of 50*l.*, at or on the 11th day of October then next ensuing the day of the date thereof; the further sum of 5*l.*, other part of the like sum, at or on the 6th day of April 1833 (and so on by half-yearly instalments of 5*l.* every 6th of April and 11th of October); and the further sum of 5*l.*, other and remaining part of the like sum of 50*l.*, at or on the 6th day of April 1837; “but nevertheless it was by the said agreement or instrument declared, that it was thereby considered and fully intended, both by the receiver as well as the givers of that note of hand, that all installed payments thereupon whatsoever, from and immediately after the decease of the said plaintiff, should cease and become null and void to all intents and purposes, against the executors, administrators, representatives, or relatives of the said plaintiff, in respect to her personal estate, as well as all effects named, stated, and contained in the said inventory, and that no claim should be made or had thereupon;” as, by the said agreement or instrument, reference &c.: and the said agreement or instrument being made as aforesaid, afterwards to wit, &c. in consideration of the premises, and that the said plaintiff, at the request of the said defendant, had then promised the said defendant to perform and fulfil the said agreement or instrument in all things on her part to be performed and fulfilled (mutual promises); breach, non-payment of the instalments which by and according to the said agreement or instrument respectively became due and were to be paid on the 6th of April and 11th of October 1834, contrary to the tenor and effect of the said agreement or instrument, and of the said promise of the said defendants. Second count, on an account stated.

Plea. The said defendants, by F. J. their attorney, say that the said defendants did not make the said supposed promissory note in the said first count mentioned, in manner and form as the plaintiff hath in the said first count alleged (conclusion to the country); and as to the said last count of the said declaration &c. (non assumpsit).

The plaintiff demurred specially to the first plea, assigning for causes, that the said plea, not being otherwise expressed, and not being pleaded as to any particular count or part of the declaration, is to and must be deemed and taken as pleaded to the whole of the said declaration, and in bar of the whole action; whereas that plea would at the most be an answer only as to the first count of the said declaration. And also that the defendants have in that plea alleged that they did not make the said supposed promissory note in the said first count mentioned, whereas that count does not mention any promissory note, but is a count upon the agreement or instrument in writing therein mentioned, and which agreement or instrument is not, nor can it operate as, a promissory note; and also that the said plea purports to take issue upon a certain fact, but which fact is not alleged in the said first count of the said declaration. Joinder in demurrer. Issue was joined on the second plea.

Wightman in support of the demurrer. First, the first plea is pleaded to the whole declaration, but offers no answer to the second count. Secondly, it offers no answer to the first count; for it merely denies the making of the promissory note mentioned in the first count, whereas the first count mentions no promissory note, nor is the instrument there described in effect a promissory note, because the payments are contingent upon the continuance of the life of the plaintiff; Carlos v. Fancourt (a), Roberts v. Peake (b), Leeds v. Lancashire (c), Williamson v. Bennett (d), Kingston v. Long (e), Bolton v. Dugdale (g). The principle was also admitted in the judgment in Richards v. Richards (h). This is a mere agreement.

Miller contra. First, the rule of Hil. 4 W. 4. General Rules and Regulations, 9. (i) does not make the first plea a plea to both counts, but to the whole cause of action contained in that count which the plea professes to answer. Now the traverse here is expressly of the fact alleged in the first count. The only object of the rule was, that the party might know what his adversary professed to answer: that is not left in doubt here; especially as, upon looking at the whole record (which may be done to explain the meaning of an allegation), a separate answer appears, in the second plea, to the second count. Secondly, if the instrument be not technically a promissory note, (though it may be observed that the contingency was one upon which the liability was to cease, not to arise) still the first plea sufficiently traverses the allegation in the first count. It may be admitted that the plaintiff was not bound to treat it as a technical promissory note; but the plea does Wightman in reply. First, the rule Hil. 4 W. 4. General Rules and Regulations, 9. (a), is express: the formal parts of the ancient introduction to a plea not being introduced, the plea must be understood, not being otherwise expressed, to be in bar of the whole action. [Patteson J. But, looking at the whole language of the rule, is not the sense of it, that the plea shall be held to be in bar of the whole count to which it is pleaded? There was a case to that effect (b). I can, however, conceive a case, for instance, where there might be two counts on the same policy of insurance, in which a plea, that the defendant did not make the policy in the first count mentioned, might be an answer to the whole; and from this it seems to follow, that the language of the plea here does not confine the answer to the first count.] The objection then rests, not on the new rules, but on the plea being not confined by its form or matter to the first count, yet affording an answer to the first count only. The second plea cannot be taken into consideration to explain the first. Secondly, the defendant ought to have followed the language of the declaration, unless the legal effect justified a variation from it, which is not the case here. It is not necessary to consider whether, on general demurrer, the plea might not have been supported: it is clearly informal; and, as such, bad on special demurrer.

LITTLEDALE J. (a) As to the first objection, I am disposed to think that the first plea, though it expressly refers to the first count, and answers that only, is pleaded to the whole declaration. But on this point I give no opinion, for I have no doubt on the second. The declaration does not call the instrument a promissory note, nor does the plaintiff say that the defendants made any promissory note. It is true that in the instrument itself the words "note of hand" are used, and it is said also that the defendants "promised to pay;" but the declaration sets the whole out, and it then appears to be on a contingency. It has been remarked that the contingency was one upon which the liability was to cease, not to arise: but that is the same thing; it is not an engagement to pay at all events. The calling it a "note of hand" is nothing: we see that it is not the instrument which is technically called a promissory note. The plea therefore denies a fact which is not in issue at all. If this be merely an agreement, the defendants had no right, by their plea, to put such a technical construction on it.

PATTERSON J. The instrument makes the instalments payable on a contingency: it might have happened that not one farthing might have become due, as if the plaintiff had died between the 14th of May 1832, and the 11th of October following. That is clearly a contingent liability; and the instrument is therefore not a promissory note. Then is it so called in the declaration? No. That is studiously avoided, except where, from the necessity of following the language of the instrument, the words "note of hand" are used. Then the first plea says that the defendants did not make the said promissory note in manner and form as the plaintiff hath in the first count alleged; but the first count contains no such allegation: the plea therefore tenders no issue on any allegation in the declaration. As to the other objection, I wish not to be supposed to think that it is not a good ground of special demurrer; since, if the first were the only plea on the record, it could hardly be considered so necessarily confined to the first count, as that the plaintiff might sign judgment for want of a plea to the second. I can conceive, though with some difficulty, a case in which a plea, in the same form as the first plea here, would answer more counts than one.

against
HARRISON.

WILLIAMS J. As to the first objection; the language of the instrument certainly is, that the defendants jointly and separately promised to pay (which is the common form of a promissory note), and the instrument is called "a note of hand;" this expression is not given in the declaration, but in the instrument itself, which is there set out. The defendants assume that they have a right to call this a promissory note. Taking the instrument altogether, the money is payable upon a contingency. The first plea follows neither the language of the instrument, nor the description of it given in the declaration. As to the other point on which my learned brothers entertain a doubt, I shall decline giving any opinion.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Hiscocks and Another against KEMP.

It is not necessary to revive a judgment by scire facias for the purpose of issuing execution after a year and a day, where the execution has been suspended by agreement of the parties.

Such agreement sufficiently appears, where the judgment is upon a warrant of attorney dated June 1824, empowering the plaintiff to enter up judgment at his pleasure, but stating, in the defeasance, that the warrant of attorney is given to secure payment of a certain sum, with costs of judgment if signed, on the 5th of December 1826

A RULE nisi was obtained for setting aside the execution issued against the defendant upon judgment on a warrant of attorney, and for discharging him out of custody. The warrant of attorney was dated June 5th 1824, and authorised the attornies to appear for the defendant as of the last preceding or any subsequent term, and thereupon to receive a declaration and suffer judgment to be entered up against the defendant at the suit of the plaintiff Hiscocks and another for 900*l.* Judgment was signed, May 27th 1825. The defendant was taken on a ca. sa. for 360*l.* on the 5th of February 1827, and had remained in custody ever since. No scire facias had ever issued to revive the judgment. The warrant of attorney bore the following defeasance.

“The within warrant of attorney is given to secure the payment by the within named William Kemp, his executors or administrators, to the within named Thomas Phipps and John Hiscocks, their executors, administrators or assigns, of the sum of 420*l.*, together with costs of judgment if signed, on the 5th day of December 1826. And it is hereby agreed that the said T. P. and J. H., or the survivor of them, his executors or administrators, shall be at liberty to enter up judgment hereon at their pleasure, and, in case of default in payment as aforesaid, to issue execution and levy for the said sum of 420*l.* or so much as shall remain unpaid, and all costs and expenses whatsoever: provided always that the within warrant of attorney and the above defeasance are given and executed, cuted, and also accepted, without prejudice to the suit now depending in the Court of Chancery, wherein the said William Kemp is plaintiff and Luke Evill and the said T. P. and J. H. are defendants: provided also that, if any part of the said sum of 420*l.* shall be received from Sir William Mansell Baronet, who is also liable to part of the same, the money so received shall be deducted from and allowed to the said William Kemp out of the sum hereby secured."

The ground of motion was that the judgment ought to have been revived by sci. fa. before execution issued. In last Easter term (a), Sir W. W. Follett shewed cause against the rule, which was supported by Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, and Helps. The case is so fully discussed in the judgment of the Court that a report of the arguments of counsel is unnecessary.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court. This was a motion to set aside the execution upon a judgment signed under a warrant of attorney; and the only question was, whether, under the circumstances, it was necessary to have revived the judgment by scire facias prior to the issuing of the execution. The warrant was dated 5th of June 1824; the defeasance was upon the payment of 420*l.*, with the costs of judgment if signed, on the 5th of December 1826. The plaintiffs were to be at liberty to enter up judgment at their pleasure, and, in case of default in payment as aforesaid, to issue execution and levy for the said sum, or so much thereof as should remain unpaid. The judgment was in fact signed on the 27th of May 1825, and the execution issued in February 1827.

For the plaintiffs it was contended that, whenever the execution was suspended beyond the year and day after signing the judgment by the agreement of the parties, the delay so occasioned would not compel the plaintiff to revive the judgment, and that the facts of this case brought it within that exception to the general rule. The defendant denied that any such agreement appeared in the case; and further that, if it did, it could not waive a necessity imposed expressly by statute; the authorities on which such a practice was founded were asserted not to warrant it when duly examined, and in particular it was contended that the case of Withers v. Harris (a) was a decision directly in point and the other way. We have looked into the facts and the authorities, and are of opinion that on neither ground is there any reason for disturbing the execution.

Upon reading the warrant of attorney and the defeasance, it appears that, although judgment might be signed at the pleasure of the plaintiffs at any time after the date of it, 5th of June 1824, yet that they were restrained from issuing execution before the 5th of December 1826. It was therefore in the contemplation of the parties, that the judgment might remain more than a year without execution; and that it might do so was a restraint imposed upon the plaintiffs' right by the defendant. It cannot therefore be denied that the delay of the execution in this case was by agreement with the defendant at least, if not a term imposed by him upon the plaintiffs.

(a) 7 Mod. 64.

With respect to the practice, it has long been clearly understood in the profession that "if the plaintiff has judgment with a cesset executio, or stay of execution for a year, he may after the year take out his execution without a scire facias, because the delay is by consent of parties, and in favour of the defendant." This is the language of Mr. Serjt. Williams in the notes on Underhill v. Devereux (a), and we should be very unwilling to disturb, except on the clearest grounds, a practice, now well recognised, on which all persons have acted for a long series of years, and neither unreasonable nor inconvenient in itself.

 HINCOKS
KEMP.

The objections made were threefold. First, that it was contrary to the express provisions of the statute of Westminster 2. (13 Ed. 1. stat. 1.) (b). This appears to us to be a mistake; the scire facias in personal actions was given by that statute rather in aid of plaintiffs than in restraint of them. At the common law a presumption arose from a plaintiff's delay beyond a year, that his judgment either had been satisfied, or from some supervening cause ought not to be allowed to have its effect in execution. After such delay, therefore, he was not allowed to issue execution as a matter of course, but was driven to bring a new action on the judgment. The scire facias, which had been in use at the common law, for the purpose of executing judgments in real actions after a year and day's delay, was therefore adopted by the statute as a less expensive and dilatory course for the plaintiff, and as equally affording protection to the defendant, if he had any reason to shew why the execution should not issue. It is not then in contravention of the statute, to hold that a scire facias, given in lieu of the action on the judgment, is not necessary, where such action would not have been so; and what arguments could a defendant have used to induce the setting aside an execution, on the ground of delay, and the legal presumption consequent thereon, when such delay was shewn to have originated, and the presumption therefore to fall to the ground, by his own act?

The second objection was, that the case of Withers v. Harris (a) was an authority directly opposed to the practice. The facts of that case are reported in 7 Mod. thus. "Judgment was given in ejectment upon terms, that there should not be execution until such a time, which was a year and a half after. The sole question was, Whether this judgment could be executed without a scire facias?" and the report concludes, "the execution was set aside as irregular, and restitution granted." There are seven other reports of this case referred to in the margin, one in the same volume (b), three in Salkeld (c), two in Holt (d), and one in Lord Raymond (e): in no one of these is the fact stated that the execution was stayed on terms, nor in the report cited at the bar is it mentioned in the arguments or judgment. The point in discussion was, whether a scire facias either at common law or by the statute was necessary for the purpose of suing an habere facias possessionem in ejectment. It was admitted that a scire facias was necessary in the principal case, so far as regarded the damages to be levied by fiery facias; whereas that point would have been equally debateable, if the question had been what was the effect of the execution having been stayed on terms. The circumstances under which the delay of execution had taken place were not even alluded to, unless Lord Holt was speaking of them, when he said (a) "The party has delayed himself by not suing execution in time," language scarcely applicable to the case of a judgment "given upon terms," which terms would have been wrongfully broken if the execution had been sued out earlier. It should be observed, too, that Lord Holt in the same judgment speaks of it as clear law, that if a plaintiff be delayed beyond the year by a writ of error, he may have execution after the year (a); an undoubted position, which in truth stands upon the same principle, though another and a wholly unsatisfactory reason is assigned for it in some of the older authorities.

The case therefore of Withers v. Harris (b) cannot, when it comes to be examined, be considered an authority to shew that the present execution is irregular; but it may be conceded that other dicta, and even decisions, may be found in the older books, which cannot easily be reconciled with the present practice. Some such may be seen in 1 Roll. Abr. Execution, Scire Facias, (N.), (O.), p. 899, and even in the commentary of Lord Coke on the statute, 2 Inst. 471. It is by no means to be wondered at that such instances should be found in the progress of the courts to the establishment of the present rule. But they will not be found on examination so satisfactory or consistent, as to form a ground for the Court's retracing its steps at this time of day.

The last objection was, that the practice rested on no sufficient authority. The truth is, as it often happens in points of practice, that the written authority for it is not so much to be found in any one or more express decisions, as to be collected from the analogies of other decided points within the same principle, and from the undisputed dicta of counsel or judges, scattered through the books. Thus, as early as the reign of Edward III., we find, that "if judgment be given in a writ of annuity, the plaintiff shall have execution within the year after every day of payment by feri fac', or elegit, though it be many years after the judgment;" 2 Inst. 471. The same rule prevailed very early where the delay was by a writ of error. At first it was denied that a stay of execution by injunction out of Chancery should have the same effect, Booth v. Booth (a); but in Mitchell v. Cue et Ur. (b) good sense determined that, being within the same reason, the same rule ought to prevail, and a rule to set aside an execution stayed by injunction and by obtaining time for payment was discharged with costs. In Dillon v. Browne (c), where the suggestion was, that it was agreed between the parties, at the execution of the warrant of attorney, that no execution should be taken out till a year after, the Court denied neither the legality nor validity of such agreement, but reflected only "upon a gentleman at the bar, who was said to be advised with in the transaction, because the agreement was not by deed." And in Booth v. Booth (d), before cited, when the counsel for the execution argued that, if the cesset executio were for a year after the judgment, yet the plaintiff, within the next year, might take out exe-

We cite these as specimens of what may be found in the books on this subject; but we pronounce our judgment, that this execution ought not to be disturbed, on the principle that it has issued in accordance with the practice of the Courts, long considered as established, not inequitable or inconvenient in itself, nor at variance with any legal principle, statute, or decided authority.

The KING against The LEEDS and SELBY Railway Company.

Monday,

BY stat. 11 G. 4. & 1 W. 4. (local and personal, public), c. lix., sects. 1. & 2., The Leeds and Selby Railway Company were incorporated, and empowered to

A railway company were empowered, by statute, to enter upon and use lands for the railway, and to purchase and hold lands; they were also bound to make such alterations as were necessary for the enjoyment of the railways then in use for a coal mine belonging to L., over the works of which the railway was to pass: the act was not to give them the mines under any land purchased by them, but the mine-owners might work them, doing no damage to the works of the company, or making good the same: the company was to compensate any party interested for any damage or inconvenience sustained by the execution of any of the works authorised by the act; such compensation to be assessed, if necessary, by a jury, which the company were required from time to time to summon, and which should assess compensation for damages already sustained, and for future temporary perpetual or recurring damages.

L., being owner of land over the said coal mine, and which land was leased to B., sold the land to the company, the coal mine not being taken into account. Afterwards B., in working the coal mine, damaged the railway, and was unable to work so profitably as he otherwise could, lest he should do further damage: Held, that B. was not entitled to compensation, either for the sum which it cost him to repair the damage done, or for the interruption to the working of his mine.

Section 3. empowers them to enter upon and use lands for the purpose, and to do all things necessary or convenient for making, maintaining, altering, and repairing the railway; "making full satisfaction in manner hereinafter mentioned to all persons interested in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments which shall be taken, used, or injured, for all damages to be by them sustained in or by the execution of all or any of the powers hereby granted."

Section 18. "And whereas the making of the said railway in, over, and through the lands of the said Sir Charles Ibbetson," "will intersect and interrupt the present communications by railways between different parts of the lands of the said Sir C. I., in which he or his lessees are now working a coal-mine or coal-mines in his said lands, near to the said railway, to the injury of the said Sir C. I., his heirs, executors," &c.; "be it therefore enacted, That the said company shall and they are hereby required, at their own expence, to make such alterations in and accommodations as may be necessary for the convenient occupation and enjoyment of the several railways now in use for the purposes of the colliery working on the lands of the said Sir C. I."

Section 30. enacts, "That nothing in this act contained shall extend to give to the said company any mines, or any coals, stone, slate, or other minerals, under any land purchased by the said company under the provisions of this act, except only so much of such coals, stone, slate, or minerals as may be necessary to be dug or carried away or used for the purposes of this act, but all such mines, coals," &c., "shall be deemed deemed to be excepted out of the purchase of such land, and may be worked by the respective owners or lessees thereof under the said lands, or the railway or other works of the said company, as if this act had not passed, so that no damage or obstruction be thereby done or occur to or in such railway or works: Provided nevertheless, that in case any damage or obstruction shall be so done or occur to or in such railway or works, the same shall be forthwith repaired or removed (as the case may be) by and at the expense of the respective owners or lessees of such mines, coals," &c., "as aforesaid; and if the same shall not be forthwith done, it shall be lawful for the said company to repair such damage, or to remove such obstruction, and to recover the expences attending the same," by distress or action of debt.

Section 31. enacts, that "the respective owners and occupiers of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments through, under, in, or upon which the said railway or other works hereby authorized are intended to be made, may accept and receive satisfaction for the value of such lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or the interest or interests therein by them, him, or her conveyed, and also compensation for any damage by them sustained by reason of the execution of any of the works by this act authorized, and also by reason of the severing or dividing such lands, tenements, or hereditaments, and also for and on account of any damage, loss, or inconvenience which may be sustained by such bodies or other parties by reason of the execution of any of the powers of this act, in such gross sums as shall be agreed upon" between such owners, &c. and the company; and in case they shall not so agree, the compensation shall be settled settled by the verdict of a jury, if required, as is after directed.

Section 32. enacts, that, if the person interested in the land should not agree with the company "as to the amount of such purchase money or satisfaction or other compensation," or should refuse to accept the amount offered, the company "shall and they are hereby required from time to time to issue" their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury, which jury shall assess the sum or sums to be paid for the purchase of such lands," &c., "except for such interest or interests therein as shall have been of right purchased by the said company from any other person or persons, and also the separate and distinct sum or sums of money to be paid by way of satisfaction or compensation, either for the damages which shall before that time have been done or sustained as aforesaid, or for the future temporary or perpetual or for any recurring damages which shall have been so done or sustained as aforesaid, and the cause or occasion of which shall have been in part only obviated, removed, or repaired by the said company, and which cannot or will not be further obviated, removed, or repaired by them."

Section 33. enacts, that the jury shall also assess the compensation for any damage sustained by owners or occupiers of, or persons interested in, lands, &c., "for or by reason of the severing or dividing the same from other lands," &c., in which such persons are interested; "and also for or on account of any injury or loss whatsoever which shall or may accrue" to any such person "by reason of the execution of any of the powers of this act."

Section 34. empowers the juries, if required, to apportion the assessed damages to persons having a particular estate or interest.

At

At the time of the passing of the act, Sir Charles Ibbetson was owner of a coal mine, then under lease to George Bates, for a term to expire in 1852. By indenture of 9th of March 1831, Sir Charles Ibbetson conveyed certain land in Yorkshire to the company, the surface of which was above a part of the coal mine not then reached by the workings of the colliery. No compensation was claimed on his part for the mine, nor for any present or future effect which the railroad might have upon the mine. The company afterwards carried their railroad across this land, and over the above mentioned part of the mine. About the end of May 1834, the workings of the mine arrived at the line of the railway, and it was then first discovered that the coal, under and near the line of the railway, could not be gotten without letting down or otherwise injuring the railway; and that the part of the mine beyond the railway must also be worked in a more expensive way than would have been requisite if the railroad had not been constructed. Some damage was in fact done by the works of the colliery to the railway, which the company required Bates to repair, under sect. 30. of the act; and Bates claimed from the company compensation for the alleged injury sustained by him, in consequence of the interruption of the works of the colliery occasioned by the railway as above, and also for the expense of repairing the damage done by the colliery works. The company having refused to make compensation, or to issue a warrant for impannelling a jury, Sir F. Pollock, Attorney-General, in Hilary term last, obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to the company to cause a jury to be impannelled for the purpose of assessing compensation to be paid by the company to George Bates, for the loss, damage, injury, and inconvenience venience sustained by him in consequence of the execution of the powers given to the company by the statute, and by reason of the works authorised by the said act.

Cresswell (with whom was Sir W. W. Follett) now shewed cause. The company are not bound to make any compensation for the damage complained of. If the thirtieth section had stopped at the words "as if this act had not been passed," it might have been contended that Mr. Bates was entitled to complain of not being able to carry on the mine in the line proposed; and the act would have stopped there, had it been meant that the owner of the mine should be left in the same situation as before. But, by the words following, the mine is to be worked, only on the condition that no damage be done to the railway; and the owner or lessee of the mine is to make good any damage so done. The legislature did not intend that the risk attendant upon the working of the mine should ultimately fall upon the company. Had that been meant, the provision would have simply been that the owner or lessee of the mine should not be liable for the damage which he might do to the railway; but it would be contradictory to make him liable for the injury to the company, and then to make the company liable to compensate him for his liability. The company, by section 30., cannot take the minerals, but only the land without them; the owner of the mine is therefore in the situation of a party selling the land for the railway. If a party sell land for the purpose of enabling the vendee to build on it, and then dig so near, on contiguous land of his own, as to injure the house, he is liable for the injury. The proprietor of the mine has sustained no inconvenience contemplated by section tion §1. It is not sustained "by reason of the execution of any of the works" authorised by this act. The compensation claimed is for the risk which the party may incur by an act of his own, producing damage to the company. And the risk is quite incapable of estimation, before the event happens. Supposing the ground to give way, it is impossible to say beforehand what the extent or nature of the damage will be; or whether there will be any.

Sir F. Pollock and Milner contra. The railway cuts in two the course of the workings of the mine. What is sought is, not indemnity against risk (though no reason can be assigned why that should not be given), but a compensation for the injury suffered by the course being interrupted. The effect of this interruption has been that the lessee of the mine will be compelled to work in a more expensive way; or, if the lessee were to build an archway under the railroad, that is also a damage to him. It is said that the thirtieth section precludes the company from buying minerals; but the true construction of this clause appears to be, that the company, when they purchase the land, are, as an advantage conferred on themselves, exempted from the necessity of buying the minerals, not prohibited from doing so. There is no inconsistency in interpreting the act to give the company the right of recovering from any mine owner who does them damage, and yet to compel them to compensate any mine-owner whom they by their works prevent from carrying on his workings without doing such damage. As for the analogy suggested between the situation of the mine-owner, and that of a party selling land adjacent to his own to be built upon by the vendee, the answer is, that the company are in the situation of a party taking a title to the lands, with an express exception as to the mines below : and they have no right, independently of the provision in section 30., to complain of the mining going on. Then that provision gives them a right to compensation for any damage done to them by the mining : they, on the other hand, being bound by section 31. to compensate for any inconvenience produced by their exercise of this or any other of their privileges. The injury contemplated in section 31., is not merely that done at the time of purchasing the land, or constructing the railway. By section 32., the company are required "from time to time" to issue their warrant, and the jury are to assess compensation "either for the damages which shall before that time have been done or sustained as aforesaid, or for the future temporary or perpetual or for any recurring damages." That is an answer to any argument founded upon the damage to the mine-owner being merely prospective.

LORD DENMAN C. J. It appears to me, that this claim for compensation cannot be supported. The act does not contemplate a future inconvenience of the kind which is the subject of this complaint.

LITLEDAL J. I am of the same opinion. The extent of the colliery was capable of being known at the time of the purchase of the land ; and the claim ought then to have been brought forward. It may be true that, in that case, the proprietor of the mine might have got compensation for what he did not ultimately want. That, however, cannot be helped. It would be very inconvenient convenient if a party could be continually claiming fresh compensation from time to time. There is nothing in the act to authorise this.

a side bar rule. The books of practice state it otherwise, but no authority is cited; nor can any reason be assigned why a prisoner may not, in one case as well as another, be charged in execution by a side bar rule. But the present rule cannot be made absolute; for the record of the committitur, now in Court, states that the defendant, being in Court, was properly delivered to the custody; and this record is conclusive, until set aside, that the defendant was regularly charged in execution. The motion should first have been to set aside the entry on the roll. Moreover, after a lapse of fourteen years, this motion is too late. There is nothing substantially wrong in the proceedings; the record shews that the defendant was committed in execution, and this is, therefore, mere matter of irregularity. The defendant, however, before this rule nisi was granted, was brought up by habeas corpus and charged in execution in this action. [Patteson J. You do not shew that the judgment was revived by scire facias.] That is not necessary; for the irregularity pointed out by the defendant's affidavits is the want of a habeas corpus. The plaintiff is not bound, in answer to that, to go through all the proceedings.

Archbold, contra. The proceedings in 1821, to charge the defendant in execution, were not only irregular, but altogether defective and void. To charge a prisoner in custody of the marshal, there must be some authenticated act of the Court, by which the marshal is apprised of his responsibility. Formerly, in order to commence an action against a prisoner in such custody, a bill was first filed: then, in order to apprise the marshal and the prisoner of the proceeding, the affidavit of debt and a copy of the bill were taken to the clerk of the rules, who filed the affidavit, and indorsed on the copy of the bill the amount of the debt sworn to; and, upon this copy, thus indorsed, being delivered to the marshal, he entered it against the prisoner in his books, and delivered the copy to him. The course now is to deliver a writ of detainer and copy to the marshal (a), who enters and returns the writ, and serves the copy on the prisoner. So when a prisoner, against whom a bailable action is pending, is to be placed in the custody of the marshal, charged with that action, he must be brought before a judge, and by him committed to the custody of the marshal, the committitur apprising the marshal of the cause of action, and the sum for which the party is to be detained. And so, if a person already in the custody of the marshal is to be charged in execution in a suit in which he is not yet detained, he must be brought up to the Court by habeas corpus ad satisfaciendum, and by the Court committed to the custody of the marshal in execution; Tidd's Practice, 364, 9th ed. (b). This is the practice of the Court, and essentially necessary in order to apprise the marshal of his new responsibility, and the prisoner of the proceeding had against him. If, indeed, the marshal be already charged with the prisoner in the particular action by writ of detainer or commitment, in that case, as he is already aware of his responsibility, the course of proceeding to charge the defendant in execution is different, namely, by the mode adopted in the present case, which, however, is wholly inapplicable to the circumstances here stated, inasmuch as the defendant, at the time he was charged in execution in 1821, was not in the custody of the marshal at the suit of the plaintiff. As to the entry on the roll, it is always in the same form, whether the prisoner be actually brought up by habeas and committed in execution, or merely charged in execution by means of the side bar rule. The length of time since this proceeding was had is no objection: a mere irregularity must be taken advantage of promptly, and before the other party takes any further step in the cause; but where the proceeding complained of is defective and void, the objection is never deemed to be waived by lapse of time or otherwise; Hussey v. Wilson (a), and the cases there cited. Here the proceeding is wholly void, being unsanctioned by the practice of the Court, and inapplicable to the circumstances of the case.

Cur. adv. vult.

It seems in this case that, the defendant being in custody in the year 1821 at the suit of some person, but not being in custody in the action in which this application is made, the plaintiff in this action obtained a side bar rule for the marshal to acknowledge him to be in his custody, which acknowledgment was made, and the committitur entered on the roll; but the defendant was not then brought up by habeas corpus to be charged in execution. By the practice of this Court, the proceeding by side bar rule does not operate to charge a prisoner in execution, unless he be at the time in custody in the particular suit; it was therefore contended that this side bar rule, and what was done under it, had no legal operation, and that the defendant, although he has been in custody ever since, as it was supposed, in this action, has not been so legally. He applied last term to be discharged, but the motion was refused, because it did not sufficiently appear that he had not been brought up by habeas corpus, nor that he was not, in 1821, in custody in this suit. Now those circumstances do appear; but, in the mean time, and before the present rule nisi to discharge him was obtained, viz. on 27th May last, he has been brought up by habeas corpus, and charged in execution in this action, being in custody at the suit of other persons all the time. There is a record of his commitment in this action in 1821, by which it is alleged that he was then brought up and charged in execution in this action.

Three questions arise. First, whether the defendant can be heard to aver against this record; secondly, whether, if he can, he is prevented by the lapse of time; thirdly, if not, whether he was rightly charged in execution on the 27th May last.

As to the first, the form of the record appears to be the same, whether a party is charged in execution by side bar rule, or by writ of habeas corpus; we think therefore that the defendant, in explaining the mode by which it was attempted to charge him, is not, strictly speaking, averring against the record, and may be heard.

As to the second, this depends on the point, whether the proceeding by side bar rule was merely irregular, or wholly void and inoperative. We think that it was wholly void, and therefore that there is no waiver, and that the lapse of time does not hinder the defendant.

As to the third, the case must be taken as if nothing had been done on the judgment between 1821 and the 27th of May last, when the plaintiff, finding the defendant in custody at the suit of some other person, brought him up by habeas corpus and charged him in execution. We think that he could not regularly do so without reviving his judgment by scire facias, or shewing that he took out execution within a year from the signing of the judgment. He has not done either, and, therefore, his proceedings are irregular. And the rule must be made absolute to discharge the defendant out of custody in this action.

probate, which was 22l(a). The defendants' counsel objected to the reception of this evidence, on the ground that it did not tend to prove the actual receipt of assets by the executors. The learned judge received the evidence; and, in summing up, he put it to the jury as evidence of what the executors thought at the time, pointing out that they must be taken as knowing that they ought to include debts owing to the testator; but that, including these, it must be taken as their opinion of the amount they ought to prove for, and that the stamp liability made it their interest not to overstate that amount. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff on all the issues, finding that the defendants had, at the commencement of the action, 172l. 9s. 3d., beyond the 200l., unaccounted for, that the gross receipts were 586l. 11s., and the whole damages 498l. 13s. 4½d. In this term, a rule nisi was obtained for a new trial, on the ground of the reception of improper evidence.

Platt now shewed cause. There was evidence, besides the stamp, that the amount of assets received was as large as that found by the jury: the rule, therefore, can be made absolute only on the assumption that the stamp duty was not admissible in evidence at all; it will not be enough to establish that, if taken alone, it would be insufficient. Any act or word of the defendants may be adduced in evidence against them. This is at least an admission that one side of the account, that of receipts, amounted to not less than 800l., and the jury found receipts only to the amount of 586l. 11s. In Curtis v.

Hunt (a) Lord Tenterden treated the stamp as prima facie evidence that the executor had received the smallest sum for which the stamp could be required. Now here it is put only as prima facie evidence. It shews the expectation entertained by the executor at the time of proving the will; and, in the absence of proof that he has since applied for a remission, the jury might be warranted in presuming that the expectation had been realised. Foster v. Blakelock (b) is to the same effect as Curtis v. Hunt (a), and is relied on in 2 Starkie on Evidence, 322, 754, (ed. 2.). An executor is not bound to include bad debts in his estimate of the effects; Moses v. Crofter (c). The stamp, therefore, was evidence, though it might not, by itself, have been sufficient.

Kelly contra. Perhaps this evidence could not be absolutely shut out: but it does not constitute a prima facie proof; for it could not shew the amount of assets actually received, which is the question upon which this issue turned. The stamp shews simply the expectations of the executor as to one side of the account. In Stearn v. Mills (d) a nonsuit was entered (instead of a new trial being granted, which is the application here), because the inventory given in by the executors, on the occasion of proving the will, was received as evidence of the assets in the hands of one of them. There Little-dale and Parke Js., threw doubts upon Foster v. Blakelock (b); and they pointed out that the Stamp Act made no allowance for debts due from the deceased, nor for debts due to him but not yet recovered. But, if the stamp be not primâ facie evidence, it proves nothing at all, even by way of corroboration, and therefore should not be admitted.

LORD DENMAN C. J. This is a motion for a new trial, on the ground that, upon issue joined on a plea of plenè administravit, evidence of the amount of the stamp on the probate has been improperly received. The question is, whether such evidence was admissible at all. Upon principle alone, I think it is admissible; if it is admitted, the Judge makes his remarks to the jury upon the effect; and here the remarks made are not objected to. There have been several cases on the point, and these shew a conflict of opinion. In Curtis v. Hunt (a) Lord Tenterden held such evidence to be not merely admissible, but primâ facie evidence of the amount of assets. That was decided at Nisi Prius, in 1824; but there the probate was dated in 1796; there had been twenty-eight years' acquiescence in the payment of the duty, and, after such a lapse of time, it was reasonable to say that the acquiescence of the parties interested supplied a strong proof. I think, therefore, that Lord Tenterden was right. It was matter to go to the jury, calling for an answer. The next case, in point of time, was Foster v. Blakelock (b). There, there was some evidence, besides the probate, of acquiescence by the executor, and of something said by the testator. What the testator said, of course, could not prove assets. Another objection, besides that founded on the reception of evidence, was taken at the trial; and the rule was moved for on both objections and refused, Lord

Tenterden merely saying that the stamp was presumptive evidence which might have been rebutted, but that in the absence of any answer he thought it sufficient. Both Mr. Justice Bayley and Mr. Justice Holroyd concurred in refusing the rule; the former, however, is reported to have entered only into the other point, and the latter is not reported to have expressed any reasons. Subsequently came the case of Stearn v. Mills (a). That was an action against an executor; and the question was, whether there was evidence to fix him upon a plea of plenè administravit. Mills, the executor who pleaded this plea (b), resided away from the testator's property. An inventory given in by the executors, on occasion of proving the will, was offered in evidence, not signed by the executors; and no goods were shewn to have passed actually into Mills's hands. There the amount in the inventory, upon which probate was obtained, was held to be no evidence that Mills had received any effects. The question respecting the stamp became immaterial. It may be difficult to draw a line, so as to fix a time, before which the probate would not, and after which it would, constitute sufficient evidence. Yet, after a certain time, acquiescence would be the strongest evidence that the amount had come to the hands of the party acquiescing. It is however clear that, for some purposes, the probate is admissible evidence; it shews one side of the account, even where it might not in itself be sufficient evidence. The learned Judge therefore appears to me to have acted rightly; for the evidence was admissible, and that is enough.

LITTTLEDALE J. The executor here is liable only to the amount of the assets received by him. The question is, how the amount is to be proved? Here the stamp upon the probate was given in evidence; and it is said that it is primâ facie evidence of the amount of assets received. I have little difficulty in saying, that it is not such evidence. The object of the act was, that wills should be proved within a certain time. A stamp duty is paid on the probate by the executor. He may be supposed to say, "I expect that, if all debts owing to the testator be paid, and the tangible property should turn out to be so much, then the amount which I receive will be so much; but, as I know that he owes money, I cannot tell whether there will be assets." That is the effect of the probate: debts will be received; some property may not be at all convertible into assets: the executor says only, "This is what I expect on one side of the account, if all be realised; but I cannot say what the balance of the whole will be." There is a provision (a) in favour of the executor, if it turn out that a higher stamp duty has been paid than is required by the real value of the property; the executor having paid the duty with his own money, the commissioners are to make him an allowance if it appear not likely that he will receive it back from the estate. I cannot say that the probate is not admissible: but it is not primâ facie evidence of the amount of assets. In Curtis v. Hunt (b) many years had expired since the probate. In Foster v. Blakelock (c), I agree with my Lord Chief Justice that the point was not much considered; and the decision there as to the stamp seems not to have been acquiesced in, when Stearn v. Mills (a) was before this Court. According to one report of that case (b), I do not distinctly say there, that I do not concur in Foster v. Blakelock (c), but my brother Parke does state so; according to the other report (d), I do, but he does not. The two reports, however, may come to nearly the same thing. My opinion is, that the stamp on the probate is not prima facie evidence of the amount of assets.

PATTESON J. The issue here is, whether the defendants have fully administered the assets which have come to their hands, not those which may come. To establish the negative the plaintiff must prove, not merely that the assets existed, but that they came to the hands of the defendants. Then the question arises, whether the stamp on the probate be sufficient evidence of this. With all possible respect for the authority of Lord Tenterden, and no man feels more respect for it than I do, I cannot concur with his decision in Curtis v. Hunt (e). I do not think that the stamp is any evidence by itself, even where a long time has elapsed; but I cannot say that it is inadmissible. If the executors had said what is implied by the stamp, we could not hold that evidence of their having said so was not receivable. It would not, of itself, be sufficient evidence; but it is receivable on a plea of plenè administravit. A plaintiff may have judgment for assets, quando acciderint: the means now in the executors' hands may be exhausted, but there may be other effects not yet come to their hands.

I cannot see how a man's saying, that assets will come to his hands, is evidence that assets have come to his hands. I confess I think Curtis v. Hunt (a) and Foster v. Blacklock (b) bad law as to the present point; and I concur in what is said upon the latter in Stearn v. Mills (c).

WILLIAMS J. The question is, whether this evidence was admissible at all, as to which I feel very little doubt. The contending decisions are all beside the point which we are now to determine. The amount of weight to which such evidence is entitled is for the judge and jury; but that is altogether ulterior to the question of admissibility. Whether it proved more or less, it was impossible to reject it. On the ground taken by the counsel for the defendants, namely, that the evidence amounts to no more than the executor saying that his present impression was that the funds would amount to so much, it is impossible to say that it was not admissible.

Kendall appeared by the same attorney as Reffitt, and pleaded, first, son assault demesne, to which plea the plaintiff replied excess, on which Kendall took issue, and the plaintiff joined; secondly, a justification in respect of the defence of the possession of a house, to which plea the plaintiff replied excess, on which Kendall took issue, and the plaintiff joined.

Stenson appeared by a third attorney, and pleaded not guilty.

At the trial, all the four defendants appeared by separate counsel (a).

Verdict:

For the plaintiff on the first issue against Reffitt, and for Reffitt on the second; no damages.

(a) It was mentioned, in the Master's written statement, that the witnesses were the same for Reffitt, Kendall, and Radcliffe, and were severally subpoenaed by each: that Stenson did not appear to have subpoenaed any witness; but that, in the course which the cause took, the witnesses for one defendant were, in effect, witnesses on behalf of all. But no stress was laid on these circumstances in the argument.

L. sued K. and R. in trespass; they severed in their defences, and appeared by different counsel and attorneys: the verdict was for L. against K., and for R. against L.: Held, that R.'s costs were to be set off against the damages and costs recovered by L. against K., and that the lien of K.'s attorney upon such damages and costs was so far defeated.

But, in the first place, these are, in effect, separate actions, for the reasons given; and, secondly, it may be doubted whether the rule be so restricted. Interlocutory costs are excepted from the operation of the rule; now, as these were always allowed in the same action, the protection here given to them would have been unnecessary, unless the rule had been applicable to a set-off of other costs in the same cause. The words "particular suit," are introduced merely to prevent the inference that the attorney was to have a lien in any suit except that in which the question arose. There can be no reason for protecting the attorney against the set-off from a separate action, which does not apply to the set-off claimed in the same action. [Patteson J. I think *George v. By Mathew, as to the trespasses justified in the preceding plea, that the plaintiff, just before &c., had assaulted Johns, and at the time &c. was beating and ill treating him, wherefore he, Mathew, to preserve the peace, &c. gently laid his hands on the plaintiff as he lawfully &c., whereupon the plaintiff with force &c. assaulted the defendant Mathew, and would have beaten him if he had not immediately defended himself, wherefore &c., as in the preceding plea. There were similar justifications of the same trespasses by Daw and the other Defendants. Replication to the special plea by Johns, that Johns of his own wrong detained the plaintiff for a greater length of time, and committed the other trespasses in the introductory part of that plea mentioned to a greater degree, and with more force and violence, than was necessary for the purpose in the said plea mentioned in manner and form, &c. There were similar replications tions to the other special pleas. Rejoinder, by Johns, that he did not of his own wrong, &c., traversing the allegations of the replication, and concluding to the country. Similar rejoinders by the other defendants. On the trial before Gurney B. at the Launceston Spring assizes, 1835, the plaintiff obtained a verdict for 1s. damages. The learned Judge afterwards certified under stat. 43 Eliz. c. 6. s. 2. (a), in the common form, that the damages did not amount to 40s., or above. The Master, on taxation, allowed the plaintiff no more for costs than the amount of the damages.

In the ensuing term, Crowder moved for a rule to shew cause why the Master should not tax full costs to the plaintiff, notwithstanding the certificate. He contended that the learned Judge had no authority to certify under the statute of Elizabeth, the action being for a battery; and that the plaintiff was not deprived of his costs by the want of a certificate, under stat. 22 and 23 *Car. 2. c. 9. s. 136. contradictory on the question, whether an imprisonment necessarily included a battery (Oxley v. Flower (a), Emmett v. Lyne (b), *Wiffin v. A rule nisi was granted.

Erle and Rowe now shewed cause. The clear intent of the statute of Charles II. was, that if, in the cases there pointed out, the Judge thought the action frivolous, and did not certify, the plaintiff should not have his full costs. And, in the absence of a certificate, if there have been special pleas, it does not necessarily follow that the costs shall be allowed. In *Washer v. (e) The plea in the case then before the Court was, molliter manus, &c. by reason of the plaintiff having entered the defendant's garden. It is not expressly said how that case ended. In Philpot v. Jones the plea was a justification under process, to an action of trespass quare clausum fregit; and the case appears to have been cited in answer to two Anonymous cases (2 Ventr. 180, 195.) mentioned at the bar, where, in actions of trespass quare clausum fregit (and for other trespasses, not specified in the report), justifications had been pleaded.

full costs, Lee J. said, "that the rule is not, that the plaintiff shall be entitled to full costs in all these actions of trespass, where there is special pleading;" and he cited an instance to the contrary in Philpot v. Jones, Hil. 1 G. 1. In the present case, the plea of son assault demesne is not traversed: the plaintiff admits the justification, and relies merely on an alleged excess. That excess is not specially pleaded to, but simply denied. Any effect, then, which might result from the admission of a battery on the pleading is done away, and the want of a certificate under stat. 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 9. is not supplied. As to every thing but the battery, the certificate under 43 Eliz. operates. The case is like Wiffin v. Kincard (a), which is recognised in Briggs v. Bowgin (b), and where the action was for an assault, battery, and false imprisonment. The jury found a verdict for 1s. damages, and the judge certified under the statute of Elizabeth. The Court held that the certificate deprived the plaintiff of his full costs as to the imprisonment, and that he could not recover full costs for the assault and battery for want of a certificate under the statute of Charles. [Patteson J. It does not appear that there was any special plea in that case; where there is such a plea it has always been held equivalent to a certificate since I can remember.] In Stead v. Gamble (c) there was a special plea (upon which the defendant had a verdict); and, notwithstanding that plea, the Court held, in the absence of a certificate, that the Plaintiff should recover no more damages than costs. [Patteson J. No question arose upon the special plea in that case. The Court held that they could not take that plea into consideration, and they refused full costs, upon the ground that the title to the freehold might have come into dispute upon the general issue, and therefore that a certificate under stat. 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 9. was necessary to entitle the plaintiff to full costs.] The ground upon which a special plea removes the necessity of a certificate is, that the record then shews what should otherwise be certified by the judge, viz. that a battery was in fact committed, or that the title to freehold was in question (a). Here the record does not shew that such an issue was raised. The assault and battery are justified; the justification is admitted, but it is alleged that there was an excess; and as to that excess there is no special plea: it is, therefore, as if nothing but the general issue had been pleaded. Where the finding upon a plea of justification is against the defendant, the plea is equivalent to a certificate; but not so where the justification is found for him, or is admitted on the record. In Smith v. Edge (b), which may be relied upon on the other side, the issue on the plea of justification was found against the defendants. As to the tearing of the clothes, the plaintiff would lose his costs by the certificate under the statute of Elizabeth, which is not interfered with in this respect by the statute of Charles, as appears from Broadbent v. Woodhead (c). [Littledale J. Tearing the clothes would not be considered as separate from the battery, if the whole appeared to be one transaction; Mears v. Greenaway (a), Lockwood v. Stannard (b); though a different rule prevailed before those cases; Cotterill v. Tolly (c)]. It may be questioned, whether the excess, which is here alleged by way of new assignment, amounts to such a battery as is excepted in stat. 43 Eliz. c. 6. s. 2. The intention, at least, of that statute was to exclude complaints of such a trifling kind from the superior courts. [Lord DENMAN C. J. Crowder, contrà, was stopped by the Court.

LORD DENMAN C. J. It is clear that the learned Judge had not power to grant this certificate. The action was for a battery. It is hard to reconcile almost any set of cases on the subject of costs; but it seems clear that the statute of Elizabeth includes this case in the exception, and not in the rule.

LITLEDALE J. The statute of Elizabeth excludes from the provisions of the second section cases in which the action is for any battery. Then, by the statute of Charles, in all actions of trespass, assault, and battery, where the Judge at the trial shall not certify that a battery was sufficiently proved, and the jury shall not find 40s. damages, the plaintiff shall not recover more costs than damages. Here, therefore, the plaintiff was prima facie debarred from recovering his full costs. But then it has been held that the admission of a battery by a special plea supersedes the necessity of a certificate under the statute of Charles. Here the plea is special, and in the first instance admits the battery, but justifies it. The reply is, excess, which is simply traversed. Still, a battery is admitted by the plea, and, where that is so, the plaintiff, if he obtains a verdict, is entitled to his full costs, although there be no certificate.

PATTERSON J. I do not mean at this time to go into all the cases on the present subject. In Wiffin v. Kincard (a) there was no special plea, and there were two causes of action, an imprisonment and a battery. The imprisonment was not within the exception in the statute of Elizabeth, and as to that the Judge certified; and he did not certify under the statute of Charles that the battery was sufficiently proved. By the certificate in one case, and the want of it in the other, the plaintiff was completely shut out from recovering his full costs. Here, the case, as it ultimately stands on the pleadings, has been put upon the footing of a new assignment; but it is not like that. To new assign would be to say, "You have mistaken the assault, upon which I sue, for a different assault;" and if, to the trespass so newly assigned, the defendant had pleaded the general issue, or something equivalent, it might have been said that the damages were given for that trespass only, and that the plaintiff could not recover full costs without a certificate under the statute of Charles. But here the replication is, in effect, that the assault and battery justified are those complained of, but that they were more violent than the defendant admits them to be. Under these circumstances no certificate was necessary by the statute of Charles, and the Judge could not certify under that of Elizabeth.

THE wife of the above party instituted a suit against him in the Consistory Court. He appeared, and made a protest, which was overruled; but the Judge refused to direct that he should appear absolutely, or to admit the wife's libel. The wife appealed to the Arches Court, where it was decreed that the appeal was not in due time and place. She then appealed to the Court of Delegates, which (in June 1832) decided against the appeal, and remitted the cause to the Arches Court. It was ultimately brought again into the Consistory Court, the Judge of which Court decreed to proceed as if there had been no appeal. The wife then tendered her libel with additional articles, and proposed amendments. The Court rejected these; and she appealed to the Court of Arches, which pronounced in favour of the appeal, and retained the principal cause. Mr. Smyth then

Where a cause has been brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on appeal from the Court of Arches, and the Judicial Committee has decided in favour of the appeal, at the same time retaining the principal cause, and ordering the unsuccessful party to appear absolutely, subject to the approbation of the King in Council, which approbation has been afterwards given, this Court cannot, on a suggestion of error in the decision, issue a mandamus to the Privy Council to receive a petition for a rehearing of the appeal.

Nor will the Court issue a prohibition to the Committee, on a complaint that they have exceeded their jurisdiction in ordering the party to appear absolutely; it not being shewn that they have either transgressed the general law of the land, or interfered in any matter not of ecclesiastical cognisance.

appealed to the King in Privy Council, and his Majesty referred the subject matter of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The appeal was heard there on the 12th of last February; and the committee announced in open court its intention to report to the King in favour of the appeal, and to submit also, as part of their report, that the principal cause should be retained before the Judicial Committee, and that Smyth should appear absolutely; and they ordered him so to appear on a certain day, if his Majesty should confirm the report. Mr. Smyth then prayed to be heard on his petition against his being ordered to appear absolutely, but this was refused. On a subsequent day, he stated to the Judicial Committee that he intended to petition the King in Council not to confirm the decision, and requested them not to transmit their report to the King till the expiration of fifteen days, the usual time for appeal from an inferior to a superior ecclesiastical court (stat. 24 H. 8. c. 12.); but this was refused. On the 17th, he sent a petition to the Secretary of State, praying that his Majesty would not decide on the report till the expiration of the fifteen days. In answer, he was informed that the Privy Council never received petitions as to any case which had been argued and decided upon in open court. The report of the Judicial Committee was confirmed by the King in Council, February 23d; after which Mr. Smyth transmitted another petition to the Lord President of the Council, praying relief, and shewing that the report was (as he conceived) unjust and erroneous. The Lord President declined to interfere, for reasons similar to those given in the answer to the preceding application; and another petition, to the same effect with the last, being sent to the Lords of the Council, with a prayer that that it might be laid before the King in Council, a like answer was returned.

Kennedy, in the last term (April 15th), moved for a rule to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue to the Lords of the Privy Council to receive the petition of Mr. Smyth, and forthwith to lay it before his Majesty in council. This Court could have exercised such an authority over the Court of Delegates, if the proceeding complained of in the petition had taken place there; it may therefore issue a mandamus to the Judicial Committee, which is substituted for the delegates, under stats. 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 92. s. 3., and 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 41. s. 3. It is the right of any subject to lay a petition before the king in council, especially where the complaint is of injustice in the proceedings of a court; and the application here is only that the Privy Council may be directed to receive the petition, not that they should be ordered to rehear the case. The motion is not like that in Ex parte Morgan (a), where a mandamus was asked for to compel a court to grant a new trial. Here the only object is to obtain a hearing on the question, whether or not the cause should be reheard. [Littledale J. If this had been a case before the Delegates, the course would have been to apply for a commission of review; and that, if granted, would have gone, not to the same delegates, but to others.] The proceeding by commission of review was abolished by stat. 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 92. s. 3., which transferred the powers of the Court of Delegates to the King in Council; but that statute enacted that every judgment and decree there made should have such and the like force and effect in all respects as if made and pronounced by the High Court of Delegates; and, therefore, in a case like the present, some ulterior remedy ought to be given.

LORD DENMAN C. J. On the very statement in support of this motion we have no power. A court of competent jurisdiction has decided in this case. If we were to interfere in the manner suggested, we might as well call upon the Lord Chancellor to revise any decision he makes, or upon any other court to reconsider its judgments. The rule cannot be granted.

LITLEDALE J. When cases of this kind were referred to the Court of Delegates, a party dissatisfied with their judgment might have applied for a commission of review; but I have no notion that this Court can now accomplish the object of such a commission by a mandamus.

PATTESON J. This Court will undoubtedly take care that other courts shall do justice; but I never heard that we could compel any court to rehear a case already decided, which is, in effect, the object of this motion.

Cur. adv. vult.

LITLEDAL J. now delivered the judgment of the Court. In this case Mr. William Henry Carmichael Smyth has moved for a rule nisi, prohibiting the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council from proceeding in a suit originally instituted in the Consistory Court of London against Mr. Smyth by his wife, and which was brought before the Court of Arches by an appeal on her part, and afterwards before the King in Council, by an appeal on the part of Mr. Smyth, and referred by his Majesty to the Judicial Committee.

The ground of appeal by Mrs. Smyth was the refusal of the judge of the Consistory Court "to admit additional articles to her libel, and to assign to hear on admission of the said libel so altered, and of the additional articles, the by-day." The Court of Arches decided in favour of Mrs. Smyth. The Judicial Committee, on appeal, have reversed that decision, but have gone on further to retain the principal cause, and to direct Mr. Smyth to appear absolutely.

This last part of their decree forms the ground of the present application. It is admitted that the suit is solely of ecclesiastical cognisance, and no matter has arisen in the progress of the suit which interferes with that cognisance; but it is alleged that the Judicial Committee have exceeded their jurisdiction in decreeing Mr. Smith to appear absolutely, the question of such appearance not being in any way the subject of appeal. It appears that this question had been the subject of a former former appeal to the Court of Delegates, and had been decided in favour of Mr. Smyth, on the ground that that appeal was not brought in due time.

In the present appeal the prayer of both parties is, that the principal cause should be retained (a). The judicial committee have retained it, and have decreed Mr. Smyth to appear absolutely.

Whether they are right in so decreeing or not is a question of practice, not of jurisdiction. The temporal courts cannot take notice of the practice of the ecclesiastical courts, or entertain a question whether, in any particular cause admitted to be of ecclesiastical cognisance, the practice has been regular. The only instances in which the temporal courts can interfere by way of prohibiting any particular proceeding in an ecclesiastical suit, are those in which something is done contrary to the general law of the land, or manifestly out of the jurisdiction of the Court. The proceeding here complained of comes within neither of these heads, and therefore we are of opinion, that the rule prayed for ought not to be granted.

Rule refused (b).

(a) Mr. Smyth, in his appeal laid before the Judicial committee, prayed them to pronounce for the appeal, to reverse the decree made below, to retain the principal cause, and therein to dismiss the appellant from all further observance of justice. Mrs. Smyth, in the statement of her case laid before the Committee, prayed them to affirm the decree, to retain the principal cause, &c.

(b) See Ex parte Smyth, 2 Cro. M. & R. 748.; S. C. 1 Tyrwh. & Gr. 222., where, upon the same motion being made in the Court of Exchequer by Mr. Smyth, the same point was decided.

The KING against HEWES.Tuesday,
June 16th.

BYLES, in the last term, obtained a rule calling on the justices and clerk of the peace of the county of Suffolk to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding them to cancel the alteration made by the said clerk of the peace in the minute of the verdict given by the jury upon the trial of Robert Hewes before the said justices at Bury St. Edmond's, on, &c. or to alter the minutes of the verdict so given, according to the fact. By the affidavits in support of the rule it appeared that Hewes was indicted at the Bury sessions for feloniously, unlawfully, and maliciously killing three mares of the value &c., of the goods of, &c., by mixing a deadly poison called bryony root (another count gave a different name to the material) with chaff, bran, and bean meal, of which the said mares ate, and became poisoned and died. The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty by mischance," which the clerk of the peace entered in his minute book. The defendant's counsel submitted that the verdict was a special one, and amounted in law to an acquittal. After some observation from the counsel for the Crown, the chairman told the jury that they must find the defendant either guilty or not guilty, and requested them to reconsider their verdict. They retired, and afterwards brought in a verdict of "Guilty, but recommended to mercy." The chairman asked them on what grounds they made the recommendation, and they said, "We recommend to mercy on the ground

This Court will not issue a mandamus to a court of criminal jurisdiction, to alter the minutes of a verdict according to the fact, or to cancel an alteration in such minutes, on a representation that the verdict was erroneously entered at the trial.

As where a jury at sessions, on an indictment for poisoning horses, found a verdict of "Guilty by mischance," and were then told by the chairman that they must say either guilty or not guilty, whereupon they brought the defendant in guilty, and recommended him to mercy on the ground that he had no malicious intent but administered the material to benefit the condition of the horses; upon which finding and explanation a verdict of guilty was entered.

that he did not do it with a malicious intent, but did it to benefit the condition of the horses." The defendant was then sentenced to two years' imprisonment. One of the jurymen now made affidavit that the jury recommended to mercy because they believed that the prisoner's intent was as stated by them to the chairman. The clerk of the peace, in an affidavit filed in opposition to the rule, stated that he did not record the verdict first offered by the jury, but entered a note of its having been offered in his minute book (a), as a memorandum of the proceedings, and not as a record; and that he recorded the second verdict, with the recommendation to mercy, on the indictment, in the usual manner, after which the chairman conferred with the other justices, and then asked the jury the reason of their recommendation. The present motion was first made in the Bail Court before Williams J., who referred it to the full Court.

B. Andrews (with whom was S. Taylor) now shewed cause; and after the facts of the case had been stated, the Court called upon Byles to support his rule.

Byles, contra. It is true that, where a record is returned to this Court by writ of error, the Court cannot amend it. But this motion is made on the ground of the authority which the Court possesses, as the supreme criminal tribunal, to correct inferior courts in matters of practice; as, for example, to direct the sessions to enter continuances and hear an appeal, or to allow costs of maintenance to the appellant against an order of removal, where the appeal is decided in his favour. In Rex v. The Justices of the West Riding (a) Lord Denman C. J. said: "I have always understood that this Court had authority to interfere for the purpose of seeing that no illegal practice prevailed at the sessions to prevent the hearing of an appeal." A similar authority must exist in the case of a criminal proceeding. [Patteson J. The Court will compel justices by mandamus to hear, where they have improperly refused to do so; and will oblige them, incidentally, to do whatever is necessary to such hearing. Williams J. But the Court will not prescribe to them the mode in which they shall hear and determine.] If, in the present case, the verdict had been Not Guilty, and the chairman had told the jury that they must find a verdict of Guilty, would not this Court have interfered? [Littledale J. There is no such power. If we are to exercise it, the legislature must give it to us.] The Court has a general visitatorial power over the practice of justices; Rex v. The Justices of Wiltshire (b). Suppose, here, the case had been one of an offence more directly against the State, and in which the Crown was the real as well as nominal prosecutor; very great injustice might be done if the chairman could act as in this case, and the Court of King's Bench were precluded from interfering. [Williams J. In a case of larceny, or a case of sedition, if the chairman at sessions were alleged to have misdirected the jury by giving the wildest misdescription of the offence, how could we interfere?] A misdirection would be before verdict, and therefore different from the proceeding in question. Here a sufficient verdict had been given, viz. "Guilty by mis-chance," and the question was, how it ought to be entered up. The entering it was a ministerial act, with which the chairman had no right to interfere. It ought to have been entered according to the legal effect of the finding, without regard to any particular expression at variance with that effect. In Foster v. Jackson (a) it is said, "But wheresoever a jury doth begin with a special matter, and after makes a general conclusion upon it, contrary to that which the law and the Court do judge upon the special matter, found by them, or on the other side, when they begin with a direct verdict, and yet after deduce a special matter, which is contrary to their direct verdict, or in law proves the truth contrary to their general verdict premised, and closed them up, with submitting the whole to the judgment of the Court, as in this case it is; in both these cases the special matter makes the verdict and overrules the general." And this is consistent with what is said, upon the third point as to the verdict, in Priddle and Napper's case (b). Here, the finding of "Guilty" was a conclusion inconsistent with the special matter found at the same time, and should have been overruled by it. [Patteson J. It is not uncommon for a jury to add something to their verdict, as was done here: the usual course then is, not to treat the finding as a special verdict, but explain its effect to the jury, and take a general verdict. Here the first verdict should have been Not Guilty.] The explanation finally given by the jury was consistent with the finding of Not Guilty. [Williams J. My difficulty when the motion was made was that, if this application were granted, it would lead to a motion for a new trial in every criminal case where any thing had been done against law in the court below.] Greater inconvenience would follow from the refusal. Besides, in this case, the first verdict had been minuted by the clerk of the peace, and was therefore, in effect, recorded. Lord Tenterden says, in Rex v. Carlile (a), "We also gave our opinion" &c., "as well because it is impossible that a verdict should be recorded at the time it is given, the record of it being necessarily an act subsequent to the delivery of the verdict by a jury, as because there is no time fixed by law for the recording of a verdict; the practice being, that a minute of the verdict should be entered forthwith by the officer of the Court, and entered of record with the other proceedings at some subsequent time, when a formal record of the whole may be required. And the minute so entered is considered by the Court in which the proceeding takes place as evidence of the verdict, although the record may not have been regularly drawn up in form." The minuting, therefore, of the first verdict, in this case, was as if a verdict of Not Guilty had been recorded. The jury was functus officio. [Patteson J. Supposing that the court of quarter sessions had even made up their record, is there any decision which shews that they could not alter it? And have you any authority for saying that this Court can direct the alteration you apply for?] The proceedings already mentioned as to appeals shew it. [Patteson J. I do not consider them any instance.] Mellish v. Richardson (b), Salter v. Slade (c), and France v. Parry (d), seem to be unfavourable to an interference with the record in the manner prayed for; but those cases came before the courts on writs of error, and not on applications for a mandamus. In Rex v. Carlile (a) it is not clear that the Court would not have granted a mandamus to amend the record, if a different course had not been adopted by consent of the Attorney-General. [Littledale J. I do not know that they would.] In Com. Dig. Mandamus (A.), it is laid down that "the Court of B. R. has power to amend all extrajudicial errors, which tend to the breach of the peace, oppression of the subject, or other misgovernance." [Littledale J. The reference there is to James Bagg's Case (b), which had nothing to do with the jurisdiction over criminal courts. And Lord Ellesmere's observation (c) on the passage referred to in that case appears to me very correct.] In Rex v. The Justices of Middlesex, In re Bowman (d), this Court directed the Court at Clerkenwell to make up a record of conviction, for the purpose of enabling a defendant to plead auterfois convict.

LITTLEDALE J. (e) I am of opinion that we have no power to do what is asked in this case. It is true that this Court has a general superintendence over courts of criminal jurisdiction; but we must see that that is exercised in the manner in which we may exercise it by law. As to the example which has been given of a mandamus to enter continuances and hear an appeal, that is granted merely to put the inferior court in motion for the purpose of deciding a case: and so the mandamus in Rex v. The Justices of Middlesex (a) was only to make up a record for the purpose of enabling a party to plead autrefois convict. Here the object of the application is, to oblige the court of quarter sessions to do a particular thing; namely, to cancel the alteration made in the verdict by the clerk of the peace, or to alter the minutes of the verdict according to the fact. But, in the latter case, how is it to be ascertained what the alteration ought to be? Must the Court below be applied to to determine whether the verdict is to be considered a special one, or a verdict of acquittal? And, if the alteration said to have been made by the clerk of the peace were cancelled, what would remain? I rest my judgment, however, upon the broad ground that we have no right to interfere in this respect with the practice of the court below. It constantly happens at the assizes, where a verdict is given in the manner in which the jury here found their first verdict, that the Judge directs how it shall be entered: if a motion for a mandamus were entertained in such a case as this, parties would come from every court of criminal jurisdiction in the kingdom, to have records altered. If any injustice has been suffered in the particular case, application must be made to the Secretary of State. To comply with this motion would exceed any thing that has yet been done by the Court. Nothing has been adduced in support of it but analogies, which I think fail.

PATTESON J. No authority or real analogy has been cited in support of this motion, and we cannot extend our jurisdiction. The case of a mandamus to enter continuances and hear is not like this. There the justices are ordered merely to hear an appeal, and to enter continuances, because those are necessary to enable them to hear. So, in the present case, if it were necessary for the defendant to have a record made up, and the officer refused to do it, the party having a right to avail himself of the record might apply for a mandamus, as in Rex v. The Justices of Middlesex (a). I have always understood that this Court might send a mandamus to an inferior court to do its duty, in general terms; but not to do a particular thing, as to make an alteration here or there in the Clerk of the peace's minutes. If the jury in this case really meant to acquit, the proper course is to apply to the Secretary of State.

WILLIAMS J. This Court will grant a mandamus to the sessions to hear, where they have declined to hear at all; but not for the purpose of prescribing to them in what manner they shall direct their inquiry. So a mandamus may be granted to make a rate, but not to make an equal rate. The writ is granted only to set parties in motion where they have refused to act. The application here is not for that purpose, but to interfere with the exercise of jurisdiction by the sessions, in a manner which there is no authority to warrant.

CASE for a malicious arrest. The first count of the declaration stated that the now defendant, after holding the plaintiff to bail, did not declare, or prosecute his suit, but voluntarily permitted the same to be discontinued, and that for want of prosecution the same was ended and determined. The second count stated generally, that the suit was determined. Plea, the general issue. On the trial before Bosanquet J. at the Devon Spring assizes, 1834, it appeared that the action was commenced by Richards against Norrish by plaint in the borough court of Tiverton, in August 1831; that Norrish removed it into this court by habeas corpus in February 1832, and in that month put in bail above; that search was made on his behalf, at the proper office, for a declaration, and was continued till the end of Trinity term 1832, at which time the now defendant had not declared; but that after that time there had been no further search. It was contended that this evidence did not shew a determination of the suit, and the learned Judge gave leave to move to enter a nonsuit upon the objection, if the verdict should be for the now plaintiff. The jury having found for him, Follett, in the ensuing term, moved according to the leave reserved; and he contended that, in an action of this kind, a year was the period after which a plaintiff not declaring was

In actions commenced in any of the superior courts, the plaintiff may, since the Rule, Hil. 2 W. 4. l. 35., declare at any time before the end of a year from the return of the writ, unless the defendant shall have signed judgment of non-pros for want of the plaintiff's declaring before the end of the second term; and this, whether the action be commenced by serviceable or bailable process. This applies also to causes removed by the defendant from inferior courts by habeas corpus, (though the cause was commenced below, and removed, before the Rule came into operation,) except that, as judgment of non-pros cannot be signed in such causes, the plaintiff cannot be out of court till the expiration of the year.

And, consequently, an action for malicious arrest cannot be commenced in any of the above cases, till a year has elapsed from the return of the writ.

to be considered out of court; Pierce v. Street (a); which period, in the present case, had not yet elapsed; and that although, according to Hutton v. Stroubridge (b), where a defendant had removed a cause by habeas corpus, he was not bound to accept a declaration after the lapse of a second term, yet a plaintiff omitting to declare within that time, and having taken no step except compelling the defendant to put in bail above, was not liable to be non-prossed; Clack v. Dixon (c); and could not, for the purpose of an action like the present, be considered out of court in the former suit, a year not having elapsed from its commencement. He also contended that even if, upon this evidence, the suit appeared to be terminated, the termination was not such as prima facie shewed it to have been without foundation, and therefore the present action was not supported; Wilkinson v. Howel (d). And he stated other grounds for setting aside the verdict, which it is not material to notice, as the Court passed them by in its judgment. A rule nisi was granted.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, and Erle, on a former day of the term (e), shewed cause. It was settled, by the authorities referred to in Tidd's and Archbold's Practice, that the plaintiff in ordinary cases ought to declare in the second term from the return of the writ, and, if he fails to do so, may be non-prossed; but if the defendant omits to sign judgment of non-pros, the declaration may be delivered at any time within a year (g). And where the defendant has removed the cause by habeas corpus, the plaintiff must declare, if at all, before the end of the second term after putting in bail; if he omit doing so, the defendant is not bound to accept a declaration afterwards, but he cannot non-pros (a). Now, in Pierce v. Street (b), where the cause had not been removed, and the defendant had not declared within a year after the return of the writ, it was held, in an action for malicious arrest, that the omission to declare was sufficient proof of the suit having determined, though there had been no judgment of non-pros, or rule of Court determining the suit. That case is in point, only substituting the period of two terms for that of a year, because in this instance there has been a removal by habeas corpus. At the end of the two terms, or year, as the case may be, the suit is at an end or not, at the option of the defendant, and he declares that option by commencing his suit for a malicious arrest. If it were held that he could not so proceed, a defendant would be without remedy where he has removed the cause, and no declaration is delivered; for he cannot non-pros the plaintiff. The rule, that before an action of this kind is commenced the original suit must be determined, is intended to prevent the inconvenience which would ensue if both actions could go on at the same time. That cannot be in a case like the present; the now plaintiff could not, after bringing this action, accept a declaration in the other. The dictum of Lord Tenterden in Wilkinson v. Howel (c) must be taken with reference to the state of facts in that cause. Lord Tenterden said that, to ground an action for a malicious arrest, the termination of the first suit "must be such as to furnish prima facie evidence that the action was without foundation." There the parties had agreed to a stet processus in the original action, on account of the plaintiff's bankruptcy: it did not, therefore, appear that, when the action was commenced, there might not have been a probability of the plaintiff's succeeding; and it would have been a fraud upon him, if the defendant had accepted a proposal for a stet processus, and then been allowed to bring an action for a malicious arrest.

Follett and Bere contra. First, there was no evidence that the former suit was determined. Secondly, assuming that there was, the termination of the suit, as proved, did not afford prima facie evidence that that suit was unfounded; and, according to the dictum of Lord Tenterden in Wilkinson v. Howel (a), and the judgment of Mansfield C. J. in Sinclair v. Eldred (b), the mere termination of the suit, unless it afford such evidence, is not sufficient. As to the first point; although the plaintiff did not declare within two terms, the cause was not therefore out of court. The defendant was not bound to accept a declaration, but he might have done so. The cause would have been out of court at the expiration of a year, and not before, both by the rule of Court, Hil. 2 W. 4. I. 35. (c), and by the previous practice. In the former practice, there was no real ground of distinction in this respect between causes removed by habeas corpus and others. When Hutton v. Stroubridge (d) was decided, where the Court held that, in a cause so removed, the defendant need not accept a declaration after the lapse of a second term from the putting in of bail, it was thought to be the general law of the courts that a declaration need not be accepted when two terms had elapsed from the return of the writ. There was no authority after that time, introducing any distinction between causes so removed and others; and, with respect to causes in general, it was settled in the Court of King's Bench, subsequently to the decision in Hutton v. Stroubridge (a), that the plaintiff might declare at any time within a year, if judgment of non-pros had not been signed (b). The practice is more completely established by the late rule of Court. Secondly, this evidence, even if it shewed the action to have been determined, would not amount to even a prima facie proof of want of foundation for it. Where the defendant removes the action by habeas corpus, the plaintiff is not bound to follow it, and there cannot be a non-pros; Clack v. Dixon (c). His not following up the suit in such a case does not shew a want of foundation for it. But, according to Wilkinson v. Howel (d), to support an action for a malicious arrest, it must appear from the mode in which the first suit terminated that it had no foundation. [Patteson J. You cannot contend that that may not be shewn by other evidence: there could else be no action for a malicious arrest, where the cause had been removed. A stet processus, by which the suit was ended in Wilkinson v. Howel (d), would not only be no evidence that the suit was without foundation, but would be prima facie evidence the other way, the suit being thus concluded by consent of the parties.]

 RICHARDS.

The question is, whether there ought to have been a nonsuit in this action for a malicious arrest, for want of proving that the former suit was determined. It had been commenced August 1st, 1831, in the borough court of Tiverton, and removed into this Court by habeas corpus in the February following. Search was made for a declaration till the end of Trinity term, which did not extend to twelve months beyond the commencement of the original suit. The termination alleged was the plaintiff's default in declaring. No search for a declaration was made after Trinity term; therefore, consistently with all the proof, the then plaintiff may have declared within the year from the return of the habeas corpus, and even from the commencement in the court below. Doubts may be raised whether an action for a malicious arrest will lie, where the defendant has removed the cause by habeas corpus. The point, however, is, whether the cause was out of court for want of a declaration before the end of Trinity term.

Previous to the case of Worley v. Lee (a), the practice both of K. B. and C. B. as to declaring was this. The plaintiff was bound to declare before the end of the second term after the return of the writ: if he did not, the defendant (having ruled him to declare in C. B., but without such rule in K. B.) might sign judgment of non-pros. But if the defendant did not do so, still the plaintiff, after the vacation of the second term at any rate, could not declare; the defendant was not bound to accept a declaration, nor could he rule the plaintiff to declare, nor sign judgment of non-pros, because the cause was out of court; Tidd, 422.

By the case of Worley v. Lee (a), and subsequent cases, the practice of this Court in actions by bill was altered, and if the defendant did not sign judgment of non-pros, the plaintiff was held at liberty to declare at any time within a year, and the cause was not considered out of court till the end of the year from the return of process; Cooper v. Nias (b).

The old practice, however, remained in C. B., Wynne v. Clarke (c), and in this Court, as it should seem, in actions by original and in actions removed hither by writ of habeas corpus. Not that there ever was any thing peculiar in the practice of this Court in actions removed by habeas corpus, but it was always necessary that the plaintiff should declare in these, as in all other cases prior to Worley v. Lee (a), before the end of the second term; with this difference, that the defendant could not ever sign judgment of non-pros in cases of removal by habeas corpus, because the plaintiff was not nor is bound to follow the defendant into this Court. None of the cases which shew what the practice as to declaring after a habeas corpus was, are later in date than the alteration which commenced by Worley v. Lee; but, if there were any later cases, they would not be material, for they would only shew that the practice continued after Worley v. Lee in regard to all cases except actions by bill. By the rule I. 35 of Hilary term, 2 W. 4. (d), it is provided that a plaintiff shall be deemed out of court unless he declare within one year after the process is returnable. There is no exception in this rule, and we think that it applies to all cases ; so that now in all the courts, whether the action be commenced by serviceable or bailable process, or removed thither by habeas corpus, the plaintiff may declare at any time before the end of a year from the return of the writ, unless the defendant sign judgment of non-pros for want of the plaintiff declaring before the end of the second term. But in the case of a habeas corpus the defendant cannot sign any such judgment for the reasons above given. It follows that in such case the cause cannot be out of court till the end of the year, and that, in this case, as no search was made for a declaration after the second term, there was no proof that the action was determined.

The rule of Hilary term commenced on the first day of the following Easter term, and, as this cause was removed in February 1832, it is plainly within that rule.

Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the rule for a nonsuit must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

TRESPASS. The first count of the declaration (of 10th December 1833) charged that the defendants heretofore, to wit, 23d July 1833, and at divers other days and times between that day and the commencement &c., broke and entered a close of the plaintiff, situate, &c., and broke to pieces, damaged, &c. divers, to wit, ten windlasses, and other articles of machinery enumerated, &c. Second count, that the defendants on said 23d July, damaged and destroyed certain goods, &c., to wit, ten windlasses, &c., and seized, took, and carried away certain other goods, &c., to wit,

The first count of a declaration in trespass was for breaking plaintiff's close, and damaging certain chattels, on divers days, &c. The second was for damaging certain chattels, and destroying others, on one day.

The first plea, to both counts, gave colour to plaintiff, and made title in defendant under a demise from the owner of the fee, as to the close mentioned in the first count, and justified his entry, and the trespass to the chattels as encumbering the close, not averring identity of the chattels in the two counts. The second plea, to the second count, alleged possession by defendant of a close, and justified the trespass to the chattels as encumbering it.

The replication to the first plea, so far as it related to the first count, traversed the demise; and, so far as the plea related to certain of the chattels mentioned in the second count, replied de injuriâ; and, so far as it related to other of them, replied excess. The replication to the second plea, so far as it related to certain of the chattels mentioned in the second count, replied de injuriâ; and, so far as it related to certain other of them, replied excess. There were separate formal conclusions to all the distinct parts of the replication.

1. Held, on demurrer to the replication to each plea for putting several matters in issue, that the plaintiff might treat the first plea, with respect to the chattels, as pleaded separately to each count.

2. That the plaintiff was entitled to divide each plea, and to reply severally as to the different parts of each, and as to different chattels covered by each.

3. But that de injuriâ could not be replied, as to any chattels, to the first plea, which alleged title in the close.

4. That de injuriâ might be replied, as to the chattels, to the second plea, which alleged only possession of a close.

5. The replication was dated before the first day of Easter term 1834, when the rules Hil. 4 W. 4. came into effect; the replication to the first plea, and that to the second plea, each commenced in form as a replication to the whole plea; in each, the part replying excess contained no prayer of judgment, but only a verification followed by an &c.: Held bad on special demurrer.

6. Semble, that it would not have been bad, if the replication had been subsequent to the taking effect of the rules Hil. 4 W. 4.

7. But held, that the above faults did not make the replication bad as to the whole; and judgment was given for the plaintiff as to such parts of the replication as were good, and for the defendant as to the rest.

ten other windlasses, &c., and converted and disposed of them to the defendants' use. Third count, that the defendants on 1st July, and on divers other days and times between &c., broke and entered four other closes of the plaintiff, and other wrongs &c.

The defendants pleaded five pleas (of 3d February 1834). The first, second, and fifth, led to issues of fact.

Third plea. As to breaking and entering the close in the first count mentioned, and as to breaking and entering the four closes in the last count mentioned, and as to breaking to pieces, &c. the windlasses, &c., in the first count mentioned, and as to damaging and destroying the goods, &c., in the second count mentioned, and seizing, &c., and converting, &c., as in that count mentioned, actionem non; because they say, that the close in the first count mentioned in which &c., and the four closes in the last count mentioned, in which &c., are and at the several times when &c. were the same close, &c.; and that before any of the said times when &c. the late King George IV. (being then Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall,) was seized in his demesne as of fee in right of his said dukedom, of and in the said close in which &c., and before any of the said times when &c., to wit, on &c., by his certain indenture, sealed with his seal of the said Duchy of Cornwall, between the said late king and one Edward Smith, and in due manner enrolled &c., and now shewn &c., the date whereof &c., demised, granted, and to farm let unto the said Edward Smith, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the said close in which &c., habendum to Edward Smith, his executors, &c., from 15th August 1810, for a term whereof divers, to wit, seventy years are unexpired: by (entry by plaintiff, and possession); and thereupon the defendants, as servants of the said Henry and Mary (justification of the entry into the close as being the close of Henry and Mary Crease, as their servants and by their command; and of the trespass as to the windlasses, &c., in order to remove them from the close, which they were incumbering): verification.

Demurrer (of 14th April 1834), assigning for causes, that the replication tenders no single or material issue on any of the matters in the third plea; that it is double, and offers issue on several distinct and issuable propositions, namely, the demise by his late Majesty, and the traverse de injuriâ (which puts in issue the seisin of his late Majesty, the demise to E. Smith, his will, his death, that Mary Crease was his executrix, that she proved, that she elected to take the bequest as devisee, that Henry and Mary Crease became possessed, and that the defendants did the acts as their servants): and that the replication to so much of the plea as relates to the forty pieces of timber, &c., alleges excess, and also does not conclude with a proper prayer of judgment. Replication. And the said plaintiff as to the said plea of the said defendants fourthly above pleaded, says (præcludi non); because he says that, as to a certain part of the said goods &c., to wit, one windlass, &c. (de injuriâ), and this the said plaintiff prays may be inquired of by the country, &c.: and the said plaintiff, for replication to so much of that plea as relates to a certain other part of the said goods, &c., to wit, forty pieces of timber, &c. (excess), "and this the said plaintiff is ready to verify, &c." (no prayer of judgment in the replication to the fourth plea).

Demurrer, assigning for causes, that the replication is double, and offers to put in issue several distinct and issuable propositions; namely, as to part of the goods, the issue de injuriâ, as to the other part, the fact of excess; and that the replication puts in issue the fact that Oates acted as the servant of Jenkin; and that, as to the last-mentioned goods, the replication does not conclude with a proper prayer of judgment; and that the replication does not tender or take any material issue in respect of the matters alleged in the fourth plea. Butt for the defendants. The objections to the replications to the third and fourth pleas rest on the same principles.

First. The plaintiff has no right to offer distinct replications to different parts of the plea. No instance of such a method of pleading can be found. If the replication to the third plea be considered as one replication, then it is bad as putting in issue the several matters specified in the demurrer.

The replication de injuriâ is bad by itself, according to the second resolution in Crogate's Case (a), since an interest in the land is claimed by the plea; Hooker v. Nye (b), where the plea de injuriâ was held, in such a case, to be bad on general demurrer; White v. Stubbs (c); Cockerill v. Armstrong (d). It is true that, where an interest is not claimed by the plea, the replication de injuriâ is not bad for multifariousness; Selby v. Bardons (e). In that case the authorities were very fully reviewed, and the case was held not to come within the second resolution in Crogate's Case (a), on the ground that no interest was claimed by the plea. But that resolution was recognised as good law: the case, therefore, is no authority for the plaintiff here.

But, besides the replication de injuriâ, there is also a replication of excess to the same third plea. This new assignment cannot be added to the previous replication; Cheasley v. Barnes (g), Franks v. Morris (h). The plaintiff, if he succeeded on either of the previous issues raised by the replication, would be entitled to judgment on the whole plea; the replication, therefore, which precedes the new assignment, goes to the whole action; and, consequently, the new assignment is bad, upon the authority of the two cases last mentioned. The excess, again, is pleaded to so much of the plea as relates to the second count only, which is for trespass to personal chattels; it is clear, therefore, that the new assignment cannot be joined with the replication de injuriâ which is also replied to the plea to the same second count; 1 Wms. Saund. 299 a (a). The form in which the excess is replied is immaterial here: a replication of excess is always in the nature of a new assignment. The replication is therefore bad, treating it as a single replication.

But it is not in form so pleaded, which would be less objectionable: it replies separately to separate parts of the plea. Now the plea is not divisible. Had any part of it been bad, then, on demurrer, the whole would have been bad. Or, if the plaintiff succeeded on any issue of fact, the whole plea would be answered; for how could different judgments be entered up on the different issues which this replication offers, supposing the plaintiff to to succeed on some, and the defendants on others? The only instance of a divisible plea is that of set-off, which is always considered an excepted case; Dowland v. Thompson (b); Notes (2) and (d) to The Earl of Manchester v. Vale (c).

Secondly. The introduction of the new matter, the excess, should have concluded with a prayer of judgment. The demurrer is of a day preceding the first day of Easter term, 1834, on which the rules of Hil. 4 W. 4. came into operation (a). But, moreover, as this part is professedly a reply to part only of the second plea, the case does not fall within section 9. of the General Rules and Regulations, R. Hil. 4 W. 4. (b). This fault, though aided by st. 27 Eliz. c. 5. s. 1., and 4 Ann. c. 16. s. 1., on general demurrer, is fatal if specially pointed out. It is said by Mr. Chitty (c), and by Serjeant Stephen (d), that a simple prayer of judgment, without pointing out what judgment, is sufficient: but here there is no prayer of judgment at all. In Bonner v. Hall (e) it seems to have been allowed that a replication, praying for a judgment which the Court could not give, was a discontinuance. Want of prayer of debt and damage, at the end of a replication, was held bad on error in Pendred v. Chambers (g): though an informal prayer of judgment was held not to be ground of special demurrer, in Barnes v. Gladman (h); and in Pitt v. Knight (i) a replication in debt, praying for the debt, but not the damages, was held to be aided by st. 27 Eliz. c. 5. s. 1., upon error. Several cases on the subject are collected in Com. Dig. Pleader, (F 5.); but there is no authority for supporting a want of any prayer of judgment, if specially demurred to.

(a) 5 B. & Ad. l. The rule, General Rules and Regulations, s. 9. p. v., dispensing with prayer of judgment in a plea, or subsequent pleading, going to the whole action, is not expressly comprised in the rules which, by the proviso, p. x., are not applicable to cases where the declaration is dated before the first day of Easter term, 1834.

Dampier

Dampier contra. First, as to the want of prayer of judgment. It is at least questionable, on the principle of Freeman v. Moyes (a), whether the rules will not take effect in the case of pleadings pleaded before the first day of Easter term, 1834, but decided upon afterwards. In Short v. Coffin (b) the Court amended a judgment against an executor de bonis propriis, by making it de bonis testatoris, si, &c., et de bonis propriis si non, &c., in conformity with the rest of the record, after error brought. But it is enough that the declaration demands damages, and that the replication denies the plea which denies the action. Supposing there were no plea, the plaintiff would have judgment though there would be no formal prayer in the declaration. So, again, where the plea tenders an issue of fact, and the plaintiff simply adds a similiter, he will have judgment if he succeed on the issue, though there will then be no prayer of judgment on the record. The omission, therefore, is merely in a matter of unnecessary form. And a special demurrer does not affect it, unless it was bad without being specially assigned, before the statutes 27 Eliz. c. 5. s. 1., and 4 Ann. c. 16. s. 1. Now it was held in 4 Ed. 6., in Dive v. Maningham (c), that, where a plea disclosed facts making void a bond on which an action was brought, but concluded with an improper prayer of judgment, the Court still would, on general demurrer to the plea, give the judgment for the defendant. It is true that in Pitt v. Knight (d) it was said that the omission to pray damages, in a replication in debt, was aided by st. 27 Eliz. c. 5. s. 1.: but afterwards, in Barnes v. Gladman (a), the omission to pray for the debt, in a replication in debt, was held not to be specially demurrable, as being "but unnecessary form." Necessary forms are those which once were matter of substance, as giving the Court jurisdiction: such are, "against the peace," "in the custody of the marshal," &c.: or, again, as tendering a trial, or giving the opposite party his due advantage. But a prayer of judgment is not necessary: for the Court will give the proper judgment, though not prayed for, or though an improper one be prayed for; Rex v. Taylor (b), Gardner v. Jessop (c). If, indeed, the conclusion be matter of necessary form, as where an answer to a plea in abatement improperly demands judgment of debt and damages, then the objection is good; and this explains Bowen v. Shapcott (d), and Bonner v. Hall (e), and all cases in which the fault in the prayer of judgment would have prejudiced the opposite party. Even if the prayer were necessary, it is contained in the &c., as the similiter was held to be in Sayer v. Pocock (g). Pendred v. Chambers (h), which was cited on the other side, was error on a judgment in a piepowder court; and there was no verification in the replication, as well as no demand of debt and damages: now the want of a verification was error at common law, for the opposite party is not told what he is to do: and, besides, the Court above cannot take on themselves to supply the proper judgment for a piepowder court.

Secondly. As to the alleged duplicity of the replication. The pleadings may be considered as if the declaration had contained two counts only, one for a trespass to realty, the other for a trespass to personalty.

It does not follow, from a plea containing a fact upon which an issue may be taken affecting the whole, that the plaintiff is obliged to take such an issue. He is precluded only from taking two issues, of which either would meet the whole plea. The replication here is like a replication to pleas pleaded, at common law, severally to several parts of a count. There the replication must have answered each plea, or there would be a discontinuance; Com. Dig. Pleader, (F 4.). In Fish v. Broket (a) a defendant in formedon pleaded one fine as to some tenements, and another as to others; and the plaintiff replied generally that the several fines were not proclaimed according to the form &c. On demurrer, it was objected that the replication "does not divide it into two parts, s. to answer to the matter in each bar, but has confounded them together with one answer: and it was the opinion of the Court that this would be better pleading," though the replication was held good enough. There may, therefore, well be taken different issues on the replication here; and there may be different, but not conflicting, judgments on each. From Trueman v. Hurst (b) and Webber v. Tivill (c) it appears that the replication must answer the plea so as to maintain each of the several matters in the declaration, or it will be wholly bad; so that, in some cases, it is necessary to divide the replication, and reply "to so much of the said plea as attempts to answer the first count," &c., or "to the plea so far as it answers the first count," &c. [Littledale J. To a general plea of the statute of limitations, the plaintiff may reply, as to so much, one thing, and as to so much, another.] In Swinburne v. Ogle (a) the replication divided the goods mentioned in the declaration and covered by the plea; and it was not considered bad for that reason. In Solomons v. Lyon (b) a plea of set-off alleged a debt from the plaintiff to the defendant in two sums, one on a recognisance of record in another court, the other upon an order for payment of money; and the replication, protesting the recognisance, took issue on the whole debt, and concluded to the country: and it was held that the replication was bad, as drawing matter of record to the cognisance of a jury: there it is clear that the replication could have been properly framed only by dividing the plea. [Littledale J. The rule, as laid down in Com. Dig. Pleader, (F 16.) from Humphreys v. Churchman (c), is this: "If defendant pleads one entire qualification, and plaintiff has several excuses which he cannot plead entire, he may plead them severally; but if he has one matter which goes to the whole, he must plead it entire, and rely upon it." If the plea do not go to the whole of the trespasses, the plaintiff can new assign.] The defendant has a right to unite all the trespasses in one justification: and so the plaintiff has a right to sever them in his reply; otherwise he would lose the right which he would have enjoyed had he brought two actions, for the trespass to realty, and for the trespass to personalty. The plea, therefore, is here distinguished in the replication according to the subject. As regards the real trespass, possession is no answer, for the plaintiff has the possession; Com. Dig. Pleader, (E 21.): the title pleaded applies to the real trespass only; and the replication denies that title specifically, not generally. As regards the personal trespass, title without possession is no answer; but possession without title is enough. It is superfluous to allege both. The plaintiff replies generally to the possession. If that produce also a general traverse of the title, it is the defendant's fault, for superfluously pleading title in answer to a personal trespass. But, as the title is surplusage, it seems that it is not put in issue by this traverse.

Then, as to the replication de injuriâ. The arguments just urged answer the complaint that the defendant is prejudiced by the tender of this issue. Suppose the plaintiff had brought two actions, one for the real trespass, the other for the personal one. The defendant, to the former, must have pleaded his title, and the replication would have taken issue on the demise. If, to the declaration on the personal trespass, the defendant had pleaded possession, the plaintiff might have replied de injuriâ; and the defendant cannot deprive the plaintiff of the right so to reply by superfluously pleading title. The defendant is, therefore, not prejudiced by this reply. And indeed it seems that the title is not traversable, as to the personalty. For possession is not a sufficient answer where a title is not mere inducement; Com. Dig. Pleader, (E 21.): now, here, as to the personalty, possession is a sufficient answer: therefore the title is mere inducement, and, consequently, not traversable. As to this, the judgment of Lawrence J. in Taylor v. Eastwood (a) is in point. The injury to the goods is collateral to the title; Searl v. Bunion (b), Langford v. Webber (c). The cases cited on the other side, to shew that de injuriâ cannot be replied where title is pleaded, may be distinguished if the principle be taken to be, that where title is necessarily pleaded it shall not be generally traversed; and this qualification of the rule appears to reconcile many, if not all, of the apparently conflicting cases. White v. Stubbs (d), Cooper v. Monke (e), Hooker v. Nye (g), were all cases of trespass to the realty; and there title was necessarily pleaded, for possession would have been no plea. And title is necessarily pleaded, and, therefore, a replication de injuriâ is bad, in cases of personal trespass, where the defendant necessarily pleads "in destruction" (as was expressed in Taylor v. Markham (h)) of the plaintiff's title, and, therefore, necessarily shews his own. And this applies wherever, from the nature of a defence to a personal trespass, title and not possession must necessarily be pleaded; as in Crogate's Case (i), where the justification was on a right of common; for, "in a plea justifying under a right of common, the defendant must set out his title to the common specially;" Note (2) to Mellor v. Spateman (k). But, where the title is mere inducement, the replication de injuriâ is allowed, as in the case in Rastell's Entries, 620 b, Trespas ou justification concernant Closure, 1. The title being, therefore, here unnecessarily pleaded as to the personalty, the general reply is good. Cockerill v. Armstrong (a) is relied upon by the plaintiff, as shewing that the replication de injuriâ is wrong. That case, however, has been in many points much shaken. Thus, one ground of the decision, multiplicity, has been negatived, as in Selby v. Bardons (b). So, from the argument of the plaintiff's counsel, and the acquiescence of Littledale J., then counsel for the defendant, in Taylor v. Eastwood (c), it appears that a replication de injuriâ would have been good in that case; and, if so, it would have been good in Cockerill v. Armstrong (d), and is so here.

Next, as to the adding a new assignment to the other part of the replication as to the personal trespass. The goods mentioned in the second count are not identified, by the plea, with those in the third count. Where the plaintiff specifies, in his declaration, the several goods, and the defendant apparently covers all by his justification, the plaintiff is entitled to reply separately as above. Thus, if trespass were brought for ill-using a horse and a mare, and the plea were damage feasant, the plaintiff might reply that it was a trespass ab initio to the horse, and excess as to the mare. Barnes v. Hunt (e) (which appears to be adverse to this view) was a peculiar case of a licence pleaded to trespass to real property committed on divers days, and does not apply to the case supposed. The plaintiff would be entitled to answer the plea as to both the acts complained of, and to insist that both were trespasses; but he would have one answer as to one of the acts, and another as to the other act. If he were to rely upon the excess alone, he would lose his damages in respect of the horse: if he were to rely on the trespass ab initio only, he would lose his damages in respect of the excess as to the mare. The same argument would hold good if the declaration, instead of specifying the horse and the mare, had complained generally of the defendant ill-using the plaintiff's cattle. Here the plaintiff claims redress, both for the goods which the defendant had no right to take and for those which the defendant had a right to take, but not to injure. Cheasley v. Barnes (a) was an action for one trespass to realty; Franks v. Morris (b) was for one assault. Here, the second count is for trespass done to goods on one day; but, as several parcels of goods may be injured in one day, at several places, for different causes, and under different circumstances, these cases are inapplicable. A unity of day does not make a unity of trespass.

Butt in reply. First, as to the question of duplicity. The cases cited on the other side do not authorise this mode of pleading. The replications, though divided into parts, must be taken as one replication to each plea; and then an objection to any part is an objection to the whole. The plaintiff endeavours to treat the plea as divisible, like the plea of set-off, which is, however, an exception to the general rule, on the ground that the several items are in the nature of several counts; Dowland v. Thompson (c), Notes (2) and (d) to The Earl of Manchester v. Vale (d). There is no hardship in con-

(a) 10 East, 73.(b) 10 East, 81. not. (a).(c) 2 W. Bl. 910.(d) 1 Wms. Saund. 27., 5th ed.

fining the plaintiff to a single replication; for the defendants, by justifying as they have done, subject themselves to an issue on any part of their plea; and, if issue upon any part be found against them, the plea will fail altogether. Thus, if the plaintiff had admitted the title, and had replied de injuriâ absque residuo causæ, the defendants would have been bound to prove that all the goods were on the close, encumbering it, &c.; and, if part of them appeared in fact to have been elsewhere, the plaintiff would have had judgment generally. And this shews the reason of the rule against such a double reply: it is not necessary, because the whole action may be sustained by an issue on a single fact.

Secondly. As to the omission of the prayer of judgment. The cases cited on the other side shew only that if an informal prayer be made, the Court will give a right judgment, Le Bret v. Papillon (a); but, if there be no prayer at all, the objection is fatal on special demurrer.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court. After having stated the pleadings, his Lordship proceeded as follows:—

The third plea is well pleaded to the whole declaration; and, according to the usual course of pleading, the plaintiff might by a single replication furnish a sufficient answer to the whole plea: but this he has not done; and, on the contrary, he has divided his replication into three parts. For, though he begins by making one entire replication to the whole plea, he afterwards splits and divides it into parts: the first as to the trespasses in the first and last counts; the second as to part of the trespasses in the second count; and the third as to the residue of the trespasses in the second count. And the first question is, can he do so?

With the view of considering this, we may leave the third count as to the four closes out of the question, these four closes being identified with the close in the first count.

The first count charges the breaking and entering the close, and destroying machinery; then the second count is for destroying and carrying away goods and chattels. The defendants, by way of answer, say that the late King George IV., when Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall, was seized in fee, and demised the close to a person under whom the defendants claim, and because the goods were incumbering the close they removed them. The plaintiff has alleged several and distinct trespasses in the first and second counts; and the defendants, though they plead one entire plea that covers the whole, do not aver identity between the windlasses and other things in the first count, and the goods and chattels in the second count; and, the defendants not having done so, the plaintiff has a right to treat the plea as if they were separate pleas to the first count and the second count; and he has therefore a right to treat the plea, as far as relates to the first count, as a separate and distinct thing by itself. And, having that right, he has, as to the plea to the trespasses in the first count, denied the demise by the late King to Edward Smith, and which is what he would have done if the defendants had pleaded that plea alone to the first count.

Then,

Then, as to the plea as far as relates to the second count, the plaintiff there also may treat the plea as a plea which was pleaded over again to the trespasses in the second count. But here the plaintiff has not only divided the plea applicable to the second count from the plea as to the first count, but he has split this part of the plea into two parts; and, as to one part, he replies de injuriâ suâ propriâ; and, as to the other, he replies excess. We see no objection in point of law to his doing so, because the goods on which the defendants have trespassed may some of them not have been on the close at all; and such of them as were, they may have treated with more force and violence than was necessary for the removal of them; and, if such was the state of things, the plaintiff ought to be permitted to present the facts in his answer to the defendants' plea; and, though this kind of pleading be very uncommon, we see no objection to it in point of law.

Then, as we are of opinion that this kind of replication is sufficient, it is next to be considered, whether these several replications are correct in point of form.

To the first replication, viz., that to the first count, there is no objection; it puts in issue the demise alleged in the plea, and concludes to the country.

As to the replication of de injuriâ suâ propriâ, we have very great difficulty. The general rules as to that are very well understood. If there be several allegations in a plea, there are many cases where a general replication of de injuriâ suâ propriâ is sufficient; but there are others again where it is not. It is quite unnecessary to allude to all the cases that were cited at the bar, because to one class of pleas, where any interest is claimed out of land, there it is clear the general replication is not sufficient. They are mainly illustrative of the rule in Crogate's Case (a), where the second resolution is, that, where the defendant in his own right or as servant to another claims any interest in the land, or any common or rent going out of the land, or any way or passage on the land, there de injuriâ suâ propriâ generally is no plea; and, in the present case, the defendants justify under persons who claim an interest in the close in question; and, if there was nothing more in the case than that, it is quite clear that this general replication could not be supported. But then it is contended that, if the title be only inducement, there the general replication is sufficient: that is certainly so in some cases. In Taylor v. Markham (b), in Trin. 7 Jac. B. R., in assault and battery, the defendant pleaded that, at the time &c., he was seized of the rectory of D. in fee, and that corn was severed from the nine parts, and the plaintiff came into the ground to carry away the corn, and, in defence thereof, and to hinder the plaintiff from taking, he stood there to defend it, and the hurt which he had was of his own wrong: the plaintiff replied de injuriâ suâ propriâ absque tali causâ: and, upon demurrer, the plaintiff had judgment, because by his declaration he did not claim any thing in the soil or in the corn, but only damages for the battery, &c., which is collateral. Where the plaintiff makes title in his count, and the defendant pleads any matter in destruction of such title, or of the plaintiff's cause of action, there the plaintiff must reply specially and shall not say absque tali causâ (b). The same case is also reported in Cro. Jac. (c), and Brownlow (d): and Hale

v. Gerrard (a) is to the same effect. This is an action for taking goods. The case of Cockerill v. Armstrong (b) was an action for seizing and impounding cattle. The defendants pleaded that the bailiffs and burgesses of Scarborough were seized in fee of the place where the cattle were taken, and the defendants justified, as their servants, taking the cattle damage feasant: there was a general replication de injuriâ suâ propriâ, and held bad, because title was put in issue contrary to the rule in Crogate's Case (c). In that case there was an allegation of seisin in fee; and, in the present case, there is a protestation against the seisin in fee of the King, and then there is a deduction of title ending in possession; but that seems to make no difference in principle. In the case of Cockerill v. Armstrong (b) the before mentioned case of Taylor v. Markham (d) was urged on behalf of the plaintiff; but the Court distinguished between the case of a battery and other cases. The Court say, "there is a plain difference between the present case and the case of an action of assault and battery; because there if the party be possessed, even though the plaintiff should have a title to the house or place it will signify nothing, for his bare possession will justify him even turning the right owner out of the house: whereas here if the plaintiff has a right to the place where &c. for right of common &c., it may quite destroy the defendant's plea." The Court in that case also referred to the case of Whitnel v. Cook (e); but we do not so much rely on that, nor on Horne v. Lewin, reported in Lord Raymond (a), and in several other books, nor on the case of Jones v. Kitchin (b), as these were cases of replevin, and possibly, in some cases, an avowry may be distinguished from a plea in trespass, though in the late case of Selby v. Bardons (c) they were put upon much the same footing. There are many cases of quare clausum fregit, where the same rule has been held; but these are plainly distinguishable from trespass for taking goods, and therefore we do not rely on them. The defendants might have pleaded that the persons under whom they claimed were possessed of the close; but, instead of that, they have pleaded title, giving colour to the plaintiff, as to the close where the goods were taken. Upon such a plea, the plaintiff might have traversed any allegation of the title, and which in that case the defendants would have been bound to prove, and then, if they would have been bound to prove any single fact upon a traverse of that fact, they would have to prove the whole of the allegations, if the present replication should be allowed. We think, therefore, that the general replication is informal and cannot be supported.

Then it may be said that, if this part of the replication be bad, the replication is bad for the whole, according to the case of Webber v. Trivill (d), and the cases in the notes to The Earl of Manchester v. Vale (e); for the beginning of the replication goes to the whole of the plea, though it is afterwards split into parts. But, on the whole, we think that, as the replication may be divided into parts, each part may be taken as a separate replication, and that therefore the first part of the replication, which is as to the plea as far as it replies to the first and third counts, is good, notwithstanding the defect in that part which we have had under consideration as to the de injuriâ suâ propriâ.

Then next comes the replication as to the excess. There is one ground of special demurrer, that it does not pray judgment. Now, according to the old law, the not praying judgment on the replication was a cause of special demurrer. No case seems to have doubted but there must be a prayer of judgment in some form, though many cases have occurred as to distinctions in what form it is to be; many of these cases will be found referred to in Pitt v. Knight (a), and the notes there. But the rules of Hilary term, 4 W. 4. (b), have said, in rule nine, that "in a plea, or subsequent pleading, intended to be pleaded in bar to the whole action generally, it shall not be necessary to use any allegation of actionem non, or to the like effect, or any prayer of judgment; nor shall it be necessary, in any replication or subsequent pleading, intended to be pleaded in maintenance of the whole action, to use any allegation of 'precludi non', or to the like effect, or any prayer of judgment." It may be a question, whether, as this part of the replication goes only to part of the plea, it would fall within the above rule; the inclination of our opinion is that it would; and that no prayer of judgment would be necessary. But then these new rules only took effect on the first day of Easter term, 1834; whereas this replication is dated 11th of March 1834, and consequently the rule above mentioned would not apply to it; and then, that being so, the replication is informal; and, as this is pointed out as a cause of special demurrer, it cannot be supported.

The question on the fourth plea, and the replication, are in effect decided by what we have already said. The fourth plea states that one of the defendants was possessed of a close, and that the goods were encumbering the close, and he in his own right, and the other defendant as his servant, removed them. The replication splits this plea; and, as to part, replies de injuriâ suâ propriâ; and, as to the residue, excess. We have already said that the plaintiff may so split the plea. Then, as to the form, there is no doubt but in this case, where the defendants only plead possession of the close, the plaintiff may reply de injuriâ suâ propriâ, and that part of it is good.

But, as to the replication which replies excess there, as there is no prayer of judgment, that replication is bad for the reasons assigned as to the corresponding replication to the third plea.

Judgment to be entered for the plaintiff, on the first replication to the third plea, which concludes to the country; and also on the first replication to the fourth plea, which also concludes to the country; and for the defendant, on the second replication to the third plea, which concludes to the country; and also on the third replication to the third plea, which replies excess; and likewise on the second replication to the fourth plea, which also replies excess.

HODGSON and Another against MEE.Wednesday,
June 17th.

ON the 3d of January the defendant was arrested, and on the 5th he executed a bail bond, conditioned to put in special bail within eight days after the execution of the writ, inclusive of the day of execution. He did not put in special bail; but, on 10th of January, the day upon which the time for putting in bail expired, went back into the custody of the sheriff of Middlesex. The plaintiffs did not declare de bene esse; but, on the 14th of January, applied to the sheriff for an assignment of the bail bond, when notice was given to them that the defendant had returned into custody. The sheriff, however, at their request, assigned the bail bond to them, having made a memorandum on the margin that the defendant had returned into the custody of the sheriff on 10th of January. On 16th of January the bail bond was put in suit: on 21st of January the defendant justified special bail, and took out a summons to stay proceedings upon the bail bond on payment of costs. The summons was attended upon 26th of January, when Patteson J. ordered that the proceedings should be discharged on payment of costs, the bail bond standing as a security. On 31st of January, Butt obtained a rule to shew cause why so much of this order as related to the bail bond standing as a security should not be rescinded, because the plaintiffs had not declared de bene esse in the terms of the Rule V. Hil. 2 W. 4. (a);

Where the defendant has been arrested and given bail to the sheriff, the plaintiff may declare de bene esse, at the expiration of eight days from the arrest, or at any time after, before special bail is perfected; and, therefore, if, without declaring, he take an assignment of the bail bond, and proceed upon it, and such proceedings be stayed upon special bail justifying, the bail bond will not be ordered to stand as a security.

If a defendant, on being arrested, give a bail bond to the sheriff, he cannot afterwards, by surrendering to the sheriff, vacate the bond; but after such surrender, and after the expiration of eight days from the arrest, if special bail be not put in, proceedings may be had upon the bail bond.

and, upon a subsequent application at chambers to rescind that part of the order which applied to the payment of costs, upon the ground that the assignment of the bail bond was irregular after the defendant had returned into custody, it was arranged that both parties should come before the Court as if a rule had been obtained to set aside the proceedings upon the bail bond for irregularity.

John Jervis, on a former day in this term (June 5th (a)), shewed cause. The first question is, whether the bond was properly put in suit: the second, whether, if properly put in suit, it should stand as a security, and this depends on the question, whether the plaintiffs could have declared de bene esse; for, if they were prevented from complying with the rule of Court (Rule V. Hil. 2 W. 4. (b)) by the defendant's default, they could not be thereby deprived of their security. [Per Curiam. The latter point has been argued in a case now pending in the Court of Exchequer, and has been considered by the Judges of all the Courts; and they are unanimously of opinion that a plaintiff may declare de bene esse, although the defendant does not put in special bail. The rule Mich. 3 W. 4. (c), applies to all cases where bail are not perfected, whether put in or not (d).] Then, as to the first point, the assignment was regular, and the bond regularly put in suit. By the old practice, writs were returnable upon a day certain, and the defendant had a certain number of days after the return day of the writ, according to the nature of the process, and the place at which the writ was executed, to put in special bail. Between the arrest and the return day, the defendant might go back into custody, if the sheriff chose to receive him; but this could not be done after the return day of the writ, even though the time for putting in special bail had not expired. By the new practice, the capias is returnable immediately after it is executed; for by st. 2 W. 4. c. 39. sched. No. 4. the sheriff is commanded to return the writ immediately after the execution thereof. There is, therefore, no time intervening, as formerly, between the arrest and the return day; but the eight days, within which the defendant is to put in special bail, are days of grace, similar to those which were allowed after the return day for the purpose of putting in special bail, and within which the defendant cannot now, nor could he formerly, return into the custody of the sheriff. The sheriff may be ruled to return the writ immediately after the arrest, and in practice is so constantly. In five days afterwards, he may be ruled to bring in the body, which, in effect, compels him to perfect special bail; and how can he do so, if the defendant may in the interval go back to custody, and thus vacate the bail bond? Again, by the terms of the condition the defendant undertakes, not merely to appear, as formerly, but to put in special bail; and by the writ he is warned that, in default of his so doing, the plaintiff may proceed against the sheriff or on the bail bond: and the statute itself, 2 W. 4. c. 39. s. 16., enacts "that all such proceedings as are mentioned in any writ, notice, or warning issued under this act shall and may be had and taken in default of a defendant's defendant's appearance, or putting in special bail, as the case may be."

Butt, contra. No question remains as to one part of the rule, which must, at all events, be made absolute upon payment of costs. But further, the proceedings on the bail bond are irregular, and consequently the rule as to these must be made absolute, with costs to be paid by the plaintiffs. The defendant returned into the sheriff's custody within the eight days mentioned in the condition of the bond. By the new practice, the defendant has those eight days for putting in bail; and that time, for the present purpose, may be likened to the return day of the writ under the old practice. Formerly it was competent for a defendant, who had given a bail bond, to surrender himself to the sheriff, if the sheriff chose to receive him, before or on the return day of the writ, upon which the bail bond might have been given up to be cancelled, and the plaintiff could not afterwards take an assignment of it, nor sue the sheriff, or maintain an action against him for not assigning the bond: Tidd's Practice, ch. 11. (a), Jones v. Lander (b). In Plimpton v. Howell (c), which was an action on a bail bond against the bail, the principal surrendered himself to the gaoler of the county gaol before twelve o'clock on the first day of Easter term, being the return day of the writ, which surrender was not in point of fact accepted by the under sheriff (who lived seventeen miles off) until the next day, by a letter by the post; and this was held to discharge the bail bond, and proceedings thereon were set aside for irregularity. Since the alteration in the practice, Patteson J. decided in the Bail Court, in Turner v. Brown (a), that, although a bail bond is given, a render may be accepted at any time within eight days from the arrest. [Patteson J. That case was actually decided on another ground. I cannot say that my attention was fully called to the point now under consideration. Afterwards it struck me that much might be urged against what I said there on this point. The present question is very important, as it will lead to the settlement of the rules of practice on the point before the Court.] The Uniformity of Process Act contains no express provision on the present point. The old practice was founded in good sense and convenience, and should govern the present so far as is consistent with the act of parliament. Now it will be consistent with the statute to hold that, as a surrender of the person before the return day of the writ was formerly considered to be equivalent to putting in and perfecting bail (b), and therefore prevented any forfeiture of the bail bond, so, under the new practice, where a bail bond is given, a surrender within the eight days shall prevent any forfeiture of the bond, and be deemed a satisfaction of the condition. A contrary decision will amount to this, that, when a bail bond is given upon an arrest, the principal cannot, under any circumstances, surrender to the sheriff within the eight days, so as to discharge the bail, but that bail above must in all cases be put in. This would be inconvenient, as bail who enter into a bond, instead of at once obtaining a surrender of the defendant, would be obliged to incur the expense of putting in bail above, and then rendering the principal, which would increase expense to the bail for no beneficial object, and without furthering the ends of justice. The better course, then, will be to consider, for the present purpose, the return of the writ of capias to be the eight days after the execution of the process; and this has hitherto been the understanding in the profession. Price's Practice, 138, Chapman's Practice (Third Addenda, 4—6.).

(b) Lord Ellenborough, in Chadwick v. Battye (3 M. & S. 284.), said that rendering was going one step further than perfecting bail. Perhaps a render was, more strictly, equivalent to the defendant having always remained in custody, as being a compliance, not with the condition of the bail bond, but with the exigency of the writ.

Cur. adv. vult.

LITLEDALE J. now delivered the judgment of the Court. After stating the facts, his Lordship proceeded as follows. Before the Uniformity of Process Act, the sheriff, after taking bail, might receive the defendant into his custody at any time before the return of the writ. But now the writ of capias is returnable immediately after execution, and the sheriff may be ruled to return it on the arrest, although such arrest take place in vacation. Had the sheriff been so ruled in this case, he must have returned that the defendant had given bail (a). He was not justified in receiving the defendant into his custody afterwards, the condition of the bond being that the defendant shall put in special bail according to the exigency of the writ; that is, within eight days after the arrest. And the third warning appended to the writ, is, that if bail be not so put in, the plaintiff shall be at liberty to proceed against the sheriff or on the bail bond.

The KING against ROBERTS.

Wednesday,
June 17th.

THIS was an information in the nature of a quo warranto, calling upon the defendant to shew by what authority he claimed to use, &c., the office of mayor of the borough of Caernarvon, on the 29th of September, 2 W. 4., and thence to the filing of this information.

First plea. That by letters patent under the Great Seal, bearing date at Flynt, 8th of September 12 Ed. 1., the said King Edward (a) did, for himself and his heirs, will

By the charter of the borough of Caernarvon, the constable of the castle of C. for the time being was to be mayor of the borough, sworn to the King and the burgesses, and who, having first taken oath to preserve the King's rights, should swear to the burgesses to preserve their liberties, and faithfully do the things appertaining to the office of mayoralty.

Before stat. 57 G. 3. c. 45. (for continuing civil and military offices, held of the Crown during pleasure, after the death of George III. at the pleasure of his successor), the King granted to A. by letters patent, the office of constable, to be exercised by himself or deputy, during the King's pleasure. A. took the oaths, and held the office till the death of George IV. and during the six months granted by st. 6 Ann. c. 7. s. 8. and also till a second grant by letters patent of the King, made after the expiration of those six months, but before the expiration of the additional six months given by stat. 1 W. 4. c. 6. The second grant recited the former grant, and that the King was pleased to renew the appointment, and continue A. in the office, and then granted as before; and A. took the oaths again.

After the first grant, and before the second, A. appointed the defendant his deputy; and, after the second grant, but before A. had taken the oaths a second time, A. again appointed and continued him as his deputy:

Held, that A. could not exercise the office of constable till he was sworn; that the second grant to A. was not a confirmation, but a new appointment; and that, consequently, it was necessary that A. should be sworn again, before he could exercise the office; and that (supposing A. to have the power of appointing a deputy at all,) the defendant, not having been re-appointed deputy after A. had taken the oaths a second time, was not entitled to hold that office.

(a) The words of the original charter, which were referred to in argument, were as follows: — "Sciatis quòd volumus et concedimus pro nobis will and grant that his town of Caernarvon should be thenceforth a free borough, and that his men of the said town should be free burgesses, and that the constable of his castle of Caernarvon, who should be for the time, should be the mayor of that borough, sworn, as well to his said Majesty, as to the same burgesses, who (oath for preserving his said Majesty's rights being first taken) should swear to the same burgesses upon the Gospels of God, that he would preserve the liberties of the same burgesses granted by his said Majesty, and faithfully do those things which to the office of mayoralty belong in the same borough. The plea then alleged the acceptance of the letters patent, and that they were still in force: and that afterwards, to wit, 28th of April 52 G. III., by other letters patent of that date, his late Majesty George III. did give and grant unto Henry William, now Marquis of Anglesey, and then Earl of Uxbridge, the office or offices of constable or keeper of his said Majesty's castle of Caernarvon, and him, the said Henry William, constable or keeper of the castle of Caernarvon aforesaid did ordain, make, depute, and constitute, by those letters patent, to have, enjoy, exercise, and occupy the office aforesaid, with all its rights, liberties, privileges, and appurtenances, unto the said Henry William, by himself or by his sufficient deputy or deputies, during his said Majesty's pleasure: and

that, after the granting of the said last mentioned letters patent, to wit, 22d of July 1812, at a certain court of the said borough of Caernarvon, duly holden in and for the said borough, the said Henry William became and was sworn, as well to our said sovereign lord the King, as to the burgesses of the said borough of Caernarvon; and, oath being first taken to preserve the rights of his said Majesty, did then and there swear to the said burgesses, upon the Gospels of God, that he would preserve the liberties of the said burgesses, so granted to them the said burgesses as aforesaid, and faithfully do those things which to the office of mayoralty belong, in the same borough, and did then and there take all other oaths in that behalf requisite and usually administered and taken: that afterwards, to wit, 29th of January 1820, George III. died, and George IV. succeeded him that the Marquis of Anglesey, from the 28th of April 52 G. 3., until and at the demise of George III., by virtue of the letters patent granted to him by George III., and of the statute in such case made and provided, held the office of constable under the Crown during pleasure, and was, by virtue thereof, mayor: that, by virtue of the said letters patent granted to him by George III., and of the statute in such case &c., notwithstanding the demise of George III., he continued and was entitled to hold the office of constable during the pleasure of George IV., and by virtue thereof continued to be mayor: that afterwards, to wit, 26th of June 1830, George IV. died, and William IV. succeeded him: that the Marquis of Anglesey, from the death of George III. until and at the death of George IV., by virtue of the letters patent granted to him by George III. and the statute in such case &c., held the office of constable under the Crown during pleasure, said borough: and that, after the execution of that deed, viz., 28th of July 1829, at a certain court of the said borough, duly held in and for the said borough, the defendant, as such deputy, became and was sworn (allegation, that the defendant was sworn, in the same terms as in the allegations respecting the oaths of the Marquis): and that, after the making of the letters patent of the 10th of January 1831, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, the Marquis again duly appointed and continued the said defendant deputy of him the said Marquis, so being such constable &c., and as such mayor &c. as aforesaid, to exercise the said office or offices of constable &c., and mayor &c. By virtue whereof he the said defendant, continually, from the time of his being first appointed, hath been and still is entitled to use and exercise the said office of mayor of the said borough of Caernarvon, as such deputy &c.; and thereupon, and by virtue of the premises, he the said defendant, on the said 29th of September 2 W. 4., &c., and by that warrant, &c.

the record; and the following points were also argued, but not decided:—

1. It was contended for the Crown, that the Marquis of Anglesey, supposing him entitled to act as mayor, had no power to appoint a deputy, under this charter.

On this point the following authorities were referred to:—Com. Dig. Officer (D 1.), (D 2.); Bac. Abr. Offices and Officers (L.); Res v. The Mayor of St. Alban's, 12 East, 559; *Res v. 2. It was contended for the Crown, that, if the Marquis had such a power, he could appoint only by deed.

On this point the following authorities were referred to:—Bac. Abr. Offices and Officers (L.); Ca. Law & Eq. (10 Mod., Regina v. Sutton), 74.; Kennycott v. Bogen, 2 Bulst. 250.; *Res v. 3. It was contended, for the Crown, that the defendant had not any right to exercise the office of deputy mayor, or to act as mayor, without having been sworn into office after the last grant of the office of constable to the Marquis of Anglesey. The defendant contended that no oath was necessary to be taken by the deputy upon his acting; for that, first, the oath was one of sanction, and not of qualification; and that, secondly, the principal was answerable for the deputy's acts. The defendant also contended that, if an oath by the deputy was necessary, the oath taken on his first appointment was sufficient to entitle him to act after the second appointment.

On this last point the following authorities were referred to:—Res v. Clapham, 1 Vent. 110.; Res v. The President and Council of the Marches, 1 Lev. 306.; stat. 3 G. 1. c. 15. s. 19.; stat. 1 W. & M. c. 21. s. 9.

the corporation itself is, in fact, a military corporation, founded for the protection of the English interest in Wales. The distinction between oaths of sanction and oaths of qualification has often been recognized. The latter shews the acceptance of the office, and must be taken before the officer can act. The oath of sanction is merely for the security of the parties interested in the due execution of the office; and this sort of oath is not essential to the officer acting. A borough magistrate who becomes so, ipso facto, by having held a particular office, as the mayoralty, may act before he is sworn; so may constables, churchwardens, tithingmen, and many others; Anonymous case in Ventris (a); Rex v. Corfe Mullen (judgment of the Court (b)); though in ordinary cases a mandamus will go to compel them to take the oath of sanction. Now here the charter expressly directs that the constable shall be ipso facto mayor; and no intervention of the burgesses is necessary. The intention was to add the civil power of the mayoralty to the military power of the constablenesship. The clause as to the oath prescribes that the oath for preserving the king's rights shall be taken before the oath is taken to the burgesses. But the charter does not make either oath essential to the office; nor does it even prescribe the exact form of the oath, nor direct before whom it shall be taken. This is an office lying in the king's grant. If it could be granted till the oath was taken, it would be a grant whenever the king granted it to an officer at any spot.

Secondly, the Marquis had not been duly sworn. He was appointed in 1811, and then took the oath.

By stat. 57 G. 3. c. 45. (a) (1817), the office was continued till the death of George IV., which took place, 26th of June 1830. Then, by stat. 6 Ann. c. 7. s. 8. (c) Which enacts, "That all and every commissions, appointments, patents, and grants, and commission, appointment, patent, and grant, of any office or employment, civil or military, which at the time of the death or demise of his late Majesty King George IV. were or was in force and effect, and which have not been or shall not be superseded, determined, or made void by his present Majesty at any time before the passing of this act, shall be and continue and remain in full force and virtue for the space of six calendar months next after the passing of this act, unless the same shall be respectively in the mean time superseded, determined, or made void" by the then King, or any successor.

a confirmation of a defeasible office; and the office was held on without interruption; so that no fresh oath was necessary. This agrees with the language of the appointment, as set out in the plea, which professes to be a renewal and continuation of the former appointment.

The KING

Sir W. W. Follett, Solicitor General, contra. First, as to the question whether it was requisite that Lord Anglesey should be sworn at all. The distinction attempted on the other side has never been applied to the case of the mayor of a corporation. The words of the charter are express. In Rex v. Pindar (a) it was found that the defendant had been duly elected mayor, but not duly sworn; and there was judgment of ouster. Rex v. Swyer (b) is to the same effect. In Rex v. Ellis, reported in a note to Rev v. Courtenay (c), the same decision was given; and Rex v. Jordan, reported in another note to the same case (d), establishes a similar principle in the case of a capital burgess. And in Rex v. Courtenay (e) it appears that the same objection would have prevailed in the case of a free burgess. Where the corporator has an inchoate right, he may be compelled to take the oath by mandamus, or he may obtain a mandamus to swear him in; but, till that is done, he has not a right which can be supported on a quo warranto. There is nothing to prevent a mayor from obtaining such a mandamus under the present charter. A charter, granting a court in civil suits, was held to be obligatory on the steward and suitors of a lordship, in Rex v. Havering Atte Bower (g), and a mandamus was granted to compel them to hold it. Neither of the authorities cited on the other side was a decision on quo warranto; nor do they relate to corporate offices; and in Rex v. Corfe Mullen (a) the judgment of the Court seems to have been in some measure determined by the circumstance that a month was allowed to the party for taking the oath.

Secondly, as to the question whether the Marquis has in fact been duly sworn in. On the death of George IV. he would have ceased to be in office, Com. Dig. Officer (K. 10), except for the operation of stat. 6 Ann. c. 7. s. 8. Then stat. 1 W. 4. c. 6. merely continues the privilege granted by the former statute, for six months. But, before the six months granted by the latter statute had expired, the Marquis took a new appointment. This is not a confirmation, any more than a grant of a term of twenty years to a party holding a term for six months would be a confirmation of the previous term. It is only under the appointment by his present Majesty that the defendant can make title.

John Jervis in reply.

First. Where a charter makes an oath requisite to the office, it is certainly a condition precedent to the exercise of the office. This was probably the case in Rex v. Pindar (b), which is reported as The Case of the Mayor of Penryn, in Strange (c), and is referred to in Rex v. Reeks (d); from which last case it appears that Pindar pleaded the constitution of the corporation. In Rex v. Ellis (e) the argument turned upon the construction of the charter, and upon the distinction between being sworn "before the mayor," and "by the mayor." Lord Hardwicke certainly said that the title was grounded on both the election and the being sworn; but that is explained by what was said by him in Rex v. Jordan (a), that the omission to be sworn for so long a time as had there elapsed was a renunciation of the office. In Rex v. Swyer (b) the charter expressly required that the mayor should be sworn before he should "be admitted to execute that office." But, even admitting the necessity of an oath in ordinary cases, it is not necessary here. In ordinary corporations, an officer may be elected without his consent: he is usually chosen for a year; he must usually be sworn, semel et simul, before the late mayor: and the object of the oath is to secure the parties who are to be governed by him, and who choose him, and to shew his acceptance. Here the constable is appointed by patent; the grant is revocable and renewable at pleasure: he cannot be sworn before his predecessor, because the predecessor's office ceases by the new grant; and the King has the security of being able to revoke the grant, in case of unsatisfactory conduct. And the office of constable is military. The oath is not taken by him in the character of constable: so that, if he cannot act as mayor till he has taken the oath, the corporation must remain without any mayor at all till he does take it; for his not taking it will not avoid or suspend his office of constable. There could be no mandamus here to elect and swear in a mayor, in such a case. The oath, therefore, is clearly one of sanction, not of qualification.

Secondly. No answer has been given to the argument, that the appointment of January 1831, being made to a party already possessing the office defeasibly, is a mere confirmation. Suppose the custom of a manor required a termor to take an oath, could it be necessary to take a fresh oath on the enlargement of a term, which would only be by way of confirmation? The fallacy lies in calling the appointment a new grant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J., now delivered the judgment of the Court.

After reading the first plea, and the fourth replication to it, his Lordship proceeded as follows: —

This replication is demurred to.

Several other points were raised on the pleadings, some relating to the peculiar nature of the office of constable of the castle of Caernarvon, and the constitution of Welsh boroughs; and some arising as to the general doctrine of swearing in as a qualification or sanction for particular offices, as well as the general privilege of appointing a deputy. But we are not called upon to enter into these inquiries, as we find, in the replication above said to have been demurred to, a defect in the noble Marquis's title at the period of his last appointing the defendant deputy mayor of Caernarvon, which appears to us to invalidate his title.

The charter of King Edward I., in the clause referred to, has clearly made it necessary that the constable of the borough shall take the oath of office before he can be a good mayor of the borough, and of course before he can appoint a deputy; and the Marquis was duly sworn in the first instance, before he appointed the defendant.

defendant. By st. 57 G. 3. c. 45. (the object of which was to give to the appointments of the Prince Regent the same duration as if he had made them when King), the office was continued during pleasure, during the life of King George IV. But, on his death, the office was continued by st. 6 Ann. c. 7. s. 8. for six months only; just before the expiration of which period the act of the 1st of his present Majesty passed. It enacts (his Lordship here read st. 1 W. 4. c. 6.).

This act continued the Marquis in his former office for six months, at the pleasure of the Crown; and if, while in the enjoyment of such office, he had duly appointed the defendant deputy mayor, that appointment would have been good for the same term. But the grant of the office of constable in January 1831 was not the continuance of this former office: it was manifestly a new appointment, extending to the life of his Majesty and the Marquis, if his Majesty should so please. This new appointment required, by the words of the charter, a new swearing in to complete the title; and, as the demurrer admits that no swearing in had taken place after the new grant, and before the appointment of the deputy, that appointment is invalid.

The same fact is replied in the fourth replication to each of the defendant's pleas, and all of those replications are demurred to: one essential part of the defendant's title is therefore wanting; and our judgment must be for the Crown.

Wednesday,
June 17th.

TAYLOR and PARKER, Assignees of WALSH, a Bankrupt, against WILKINSON and GREGORY.

A declaration in scire facias on a recognizance of bail set forth the condition, which referred to a plea depending at the suit of the plaintiffs against the principal for 1200*l.* lent, 1200*l.* paid, 1200*l.* had and received, and 1200*l.* due on an account stated; and which condition was, in case the principal should not pay the damages and costs in the said plea, or render himself. The declaration then alleged that the plaintiffs declared in the said plea on the four causes of action above stated, but had leave afterwards, by order of a Judge, to amend, and did amend by substituting counts for 3000*l.* lent; the same paid; the same had and received; 500*l.* work and labour; 1000*l.* for interest; and 3000*l.* on an account stated: that the general issue and statute of limitations were pleaded, and the plaintiffs had a verdict for 2104*l.* in the whole; but for 1*s.* on the first and third counts, and for 1001*l.* on the second. That they obtained judgment for their damages, and 40*s.* costs, and 211*l.* costs of increase. That the sums of 1*s.* and that of 1001*l.*, were recovered on the promises mentioned in the recognizance; and that no part of these, or of the costs, had been paid, nor the principal rendered.

The defendants pleaded, in substance, that the recognizance was entered into in an action commenced by original, different from that action in which the recovery was had. That the plaintiffs had paid a fine to the King upon an original writ for 1200*l.*, but not upon any writ for 3000*l.* That the order for amending was not consented to by the bail, nor made a rule of Court. That, after the trial of the cause, upon argument of a case reserved, the Court, without consent of the bail, gave leave to the plaintiffs to amend their continuance roll, so as to prevent their suit from being barred by the statute of limitations. That by the amendment additional costs were incurred, and the bail were subjected to an undivided sum for costs of increase on all the counts.

Held, that the declaration in scire facias was good: that the recovery was had in the plea in which the original was sued out, notwithstanding the amendment: that costs of increase form no integral part of the subject-matter of a suit, being awarded separately by the Court; and, therefore, that the addition to the responsibility of the bail, in respect of these costs, was no ground of discharge for them; their remedy, if aggrieved, being by application to the Court: and that the other objections raised by the pleas were not maintainable.

consideration thereof, undertook and promised Walsh, before &c., to pay &c.; and whereas also &c., the like for 1200*l.* paid; also the like for 1200*l.* had and received; and the like for 1200*l.* due on an account stated: — and in case Gregory should not pay the plaintiffs such damages and costs as should be adjudged to them in the plea aforesaid, or render himself into the custody of the marshal, &c. The declaration in scire facias then alleged that Taylor and Parker, as assignees, afterwards (in Michaelmas term, 8 G. 4.) declared against Gregory in the said plea; and it set out the declaration therein, containing four counts in assumpsit, on the several causes of action above mentioned.

The declaration in scire facias then stated, that, on the 19th of November 1827, Sir John Bayley, Knight, then being one of the justices, &c., made an order that, upon payment of costs, Taylor and Parker should be at liberty to amend their declaration: that they did pay costs and amend; and that they did by their amended declaration complain, &c. The amended declaration was then set out, containing six counts on promises before the bankruptcy, viz.; 1. to pay 3000*l.* for money lent; 2. the same, for money paid; 3. the same, for money had and received; 4. to pay 500*l.* for work and labour as an agent, and for commission and reward in respect thereof; 5. 1000*l.* for interest of monies lent, monies paid, and other monies; 6. 3000*l.* on an account stated.

The declaration in scire facias went on to state that Gregory pleaded the general issue and statute of limitations, on which issues were joined (setting out the pleadings); that the cause was tried February 14th, 1828, and that the jury found for the plaintiffs on both issues, and gave damages as follows: — on the first and third third counts, 1s.; on the second, 1001*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*; on the fourth, 77*l.* 5*s.*; on the fifth, 1026*l.*: the whole amounting to 2104*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.*, and 40*s.* costs; and that the plaintiffs remitted the damages on the last count. That judgment was given against Gregory for the damages and costs found as above, and 211*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* costs of increase (prout patet). And that, although the sum of 1*s.*, recovered on the first and third counts, "was recovered in the said plea in the said recognizance mentioned, and for the non-performance of the said promises and undertakings in the said recognizance firstly and thirdly mentioned;" and, although the sum of 1001*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*, recovered on the second count, was recovered in the plea in the said recognizance mentioned, and for non-performance of the promise and undertaking therein secondly mentioned; yet Gregory did not pay the said sums, or any part thereof, or the said costs and charges, or any part thereof, or render himself, according to the said recognizance, which, as well as the judgment, was still in force. Conclusion, in the usual form, with prayer of remedy, and scire facias to the bail to appear on &c., and shew why the plaintiffs should not have execution against them according to the force, form, and effect of the said recognizance, &c.

Pleas. 1. That the plaintiffs ought not to have execution against the defendants by virtue of the said recognizance in form aforesaid, because no judgment was given in the said plea and action against Gregory, by and at the suit of Taylor and Parker as assignees, in the condition of the said recognizance mentioned. Verification.

2. That Gregory was not convicted in the said plea in the said action in the said recognizance mentioned, commenced, &c., and depending in K. B. at the time of making making the said recognizance, "to wit, in a plea to the same purport and effect as is contained and set forth in the condition of the said recognizance" in the declaration mentioned. Verification.

3. This plea led to an issue in fact.

4. That the plea and action in the declaration mentioned against &c., in the condition of the recognizance specified, and in which the recognizance was made, was commenced and prosecuted by and upon an original writ, set forth in the preceding plea, (which stated it as a writ whereby the sheriffs of London were commanded to take Gregory and Hipkins, and them safely keep, &c., to answer, &c., specifying the four causes of action as first set out in the declaration in scire facias): and that the plaintiffs, "in declaring in the said plea and action so commenced and prosecuted as last aforesaid, were bound by law to set forth and allege in the declaration the same and identical causes of action as those set forth and alleged in the original writ by and upon which the said plea and action was commenced and prosecuted as last aforesaid, and could not in and by their declaration set forth or allege causes of action in substance and effect at variance with, and differing from, the causes of action set forth and alleged in the original writ last aforesaid." Yet that the recovery, in the declaration in this action mentioned, by the plaintiffs against Gregory, was had in the plea and action wherein the plaintiffs declared against him to the purport set forth in the amended declaration, in the declaration in this action mentioned, and set out in the third plea above (which contained the declaration, as amended); and that the causes of action set forth in the amended declaration "are not the same or identical causes of action as those set forth and alleged in the original writ," but different in substance and effect. Verification.

5. This plea led to an issue in fact.

6. That a fine is payable to the King upon every original writ, the amount being regulated by the amount of damages laid in such writ; that the plaintiffs paid the fine only upon the amount of damages laid in the original writ sued out by them, which was less than the amount laid in their amended declaration, and less than should and would have been paid if the damages laid in the writ had equalled in amount those laid in the declaration as amended. Verification.

7. That Sir J. Bayley did not with the consent of the now defendants make any order in the said cause that &c. (as in the declaration in scire facias). Verification.

8. That the said order was not, before the writ of scire facias issued, made a rule of Court. Verification.

9. That, upon the trial of the said two issues, joined in a plea and action wherein Taylor and Parker as assignees &c. were plaintiffs, and Gregory was defendant, as in the declaration in this action mentioned, the plaintiffs, for the purpose of proving that the causes of action accrued within six years, gave in evidence an office copy of a continuance roll, in a plea wherein Taylor and Parker as assignees &c. were plaintiffs, and Gregory, who had survived Hipkins, was defendant. The plea then set out the roll, stating the continuances from Michaelmas term 1812 to the morrow of the Holy Trinity 1827, and concluding with a vicecomes non misit breve. That the plaintiffs also produced for the same purpose an office copy of a writ of testatum special capias capias ad respondendum (which the plea set out) against Gregory, at the suit of Taylor and Parker, for the causes of action first mentioned in the declaration in scire facias, bearing date July 4th, 1827; and that no other evidence was offered for the purpose above-mentioned. That a verdict was found for the plaintiffs in the said suit, on the second issue, subject to the opinion of this Court on a special case. The plea then set out the case, which is stated, in substance, in the report of Taylor v. Gregory, 2 B. & Ad. 257.; and it went on to allege that, upon the facts stated in the case, the Court of K. B., by a rule, made without the consent of the now defendants, ordered Gregory, upon &c., to shew cause why the plaintiffs should not be at liberty to amend the roll by adding a continuance from the first to the last return of Trinity term 1827, or to alter the teste of the writ of testatum special capias. That, on the 16th of April 1831, the Court, by another rule, without the consent of the now defendants, ordered that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to amend the roll by adding a continuance as above, which was accordingly done; and, by a rule of Court afterwards made (May 7th, 1831), it was ordered that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs in that suit. And the plea averred that the recovery mentioned in the declaration in scire facias was not had by Taylor and Parker upon the facts stated in the special case, and upon which the opinion of the Court was taken, but upon another and a new state of facts, not found by the jury at the trial. Verification.

10. The defendants "say for further plea, that" the plaintiffs ought not to have execution for the costs and charges in the declaration in this action mentioned, by virtue of the said recognizance, because &c. (the plea then stated the nature of the original writ, and the declaration as at first framed, and then proceeded to allege that) by the insertion of additional counts, under the order of Sir J. Bayley, additional issues were joined, and additional costs incurred: and by the recovery had as stated in the declaration in scire facias, the plaintiffs recovered an undivided sum of 40s. for costs, and an undivided sum of 211*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* for costs of increase; and, therefore, the now defendants ought not to be charged on the said recognizance for the said costs or any part thereof, &c. Verification.

Replication. 1. That judgment was given in the said court, &c., in the said plea and action against &c., by and at the suit &c., in the condition of the said recognizance mentioned, in manner and form as Taylor and Parker have in their said writ of scire facias and declaration above alleged, "as by the record of the said judgment described and set forth in the said writ of scire facias and declaration, and now remaining in the said court of our said lord the King, before the King himself at Westminster, will appear: and this the said John Thomas Taylor and John Parker, as such assignees as aforesaid, are ready to verify by the said record of the said judgment in the said writ of scire facias and declaration mentioned, when and in such manner as the said Court here shall order," &c.

2. That Gregory was convicted "in the said plea in the said action, in the said recognizance mentioned, commenced at the said suit" of Taylor and Parker against Gregory and Hipkins, in manner and form as in the writ of scire facias and declaration thereon is alleged; as by the record, &c. (as before).

4. That the causes of action set forth in the amended declaration, declaration, in respect of which 1s. was recovered, were the same and identical with those alleged in the original writ, so far as the said writ relates to the non-performance of the promises and undertakings therein firstly and thirdly mentioned; and that the cause of action alleged in the said amended declaration, in respect of which 1001*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* was recovered, was and is the same and identical with that stated in the original writ, so far as that writ relates to the non-performance of the promise and undertaking therein secondly mentioned.

Verification.

6. That the damages laid in the said original writ, and in respect of which the said fine was paid, included the said sums of 1*s.* and 1001*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.* respectively so recovered as in the declaration in this action mentioned.

Verification.

7, 8, 9, 10. General demurrers to the last four pleas.

Rejoinder. As to the replications 1. and 2., demurrer, assigning for cause that the same are argumentative and double, and do not, nor does either of them, allege that there is any record of any judgment or recognizance, or that there is or has been any judgment or recognizance, by reason whereof the defendants are or ought to be made liable to the payment of any debt or sum of money; and that they do not, nor does either of them, contain any averment of any record, except by reference to the declaration in the cause; and that they are in other respects &c. To the replications 4. and 6., general demurrer. On the last four, joinder in demurrer. The defendants stated, on their paper book, that they should contend that the declaration was bad.

On the demurrers to the replications 1, 2, 4, and 6, the plaintiffs joined: and it was stated on their paper book that they should contend that pleas 1, 2, 4, and 6, were bad (a).

Sir W. W. Follett, on a former day in this term (b), was heard in support of the demurrers to pleas 7, 8, 9, and 10, and of the replications to pleas 1, 2, 4, and 6. After stating the history of the case from the reports of Gregory v. Hurrill (c), and Taylor v. Gregory (d), he continued. The main question here is, whether the bail are discharged by an amendment made without their consent in the declaration, in consequence of which it varies from the original writ. That, as a general proposition, is negatived by the second decision in the former case of Taylor v. Gregory (e), which shews that the bail are still liable to the extent of such damages as the plaintiff may recover on

(a) The declaration in scire facias, as originally framed, stated the condition of the recognizance (as above), and proceeded to set out only the amended declaration in assumpsit, taking no notice of the former one; it then alleged a recovery by the plaintiffs, and judgment given for them, prout patet, with an averment of the identity of part of the causes of action. The defendants pleaded nul tiel record; and the record was inspected before the Master, when it was contended that the declaration varied from the original writ, and therefore that the judgment was not a judgment in the plea mentioned in the recognizance. The Master decided against the objection. A rule was afterwards obtained calling on the plaintiffs to shew cause why judgment should not be entered for the defendants on the issue of nul tiel record; and, cause being shewn (Nov. 7th, 1833), the Court, without giving any decision as to the sufficiency of the declaration in scire facias, advised that it should be amended, by stating the facts specially, so as to account for the difference between the declaration in assumpsit ultimately proceeded upon, and the original writ as recited in the recognizance. The declaration in scire facias was then altered to its present form.

(b) June 9th. Before Lord Denman C. J., Littledale, Patteson, and Williams Js. The argument was adjourned, and concluded June 12th, before the same Judges.

the counts contained in the original writ: though it is true that they are not liable on the added counts. As to the 7th plea, there is no authority for saying, as that plea suggests, that counts may not be added by a Judge's order, without the consent of the bail. Nor is there any authority for the objection taken by the 8th plea. A Judge's order for amending was sufficient. To the 9th plea it is a complete answer, that the judgment remains unreversed. The 10th plea is pleaded as an answer to the whole declaration, and therefore bad. Admitting the plea to be true, there is still a forfeiture of the recognizance.

1835.

TAYLOR
against
WILKINSON.

Then, as to the matters pleaded in reply. The 1st replication is properly pleaded, and brings the record on which the plaintiffs rely, fully before the Court. The plaintiffs tie themselves down to the proof of a particular record. So, in the second replication, the judgment relied upon is distinctly pointed out, and a verification of that judgment offered, by the record. The demurrers to the 4th and 6th replications raise the point which was decided in Taylor v. Gregory (a). If it is said that the plaintiffs did not, in point of fact, ultimately recover upon causes of action which were stated in the original writ: that might be so; but the question was for a jury. If, however, the defendants mean to contend (as they probably do, on demurrer) that after amendment the causes could not be the same, that question is disposed of by Taylor v. Gregory (a). And there is no authority for contending that, because the declaration was amended, the action could not be the same. It is true that, formerly at least, where an action was commenced by original, the writ was supposed to contain the whole of the declaration, and, if the declaration were amended, it would be presumed that the original would receive a corresponding amendment, if necessary. And, at one time, a variance between the declaration and the original might have been taken advantage of by the defendant; but that was subsequently prevented, after verdict, by express statutory provision; 18 Eliz. c. 14. s. 1.; 21 Ja. 1. c. 13. s. 2.; 5 G. 1. c. 13. s. 1.; and before verdict, by the refusal of the Courts to grant oyer of original writs. In 1 Wms. Saunders 318. (a) Mr. Serjt. Williams, after discussing the subject of variance between the original writ and declaration, says, "From hence it seems to follow, that no advantage whatever can now be had, either of a defective original, or of a variance between it and the declaration." If the defendant himself could not take this advantage, the bail cannot.

The real question then is, whether the former decision of this Court, as to the liability of bail after amendment of the declaration, be a correct one or not. It is stated, in 2 Wms. Saund. 71 d, e, (b), that bail are discharged if the plaintiff declares for a different cause of action from that mentioned in the writ, and instances are referred to. The rule furnished by the authorities appears to be, that if the form of action be different, whether the suit was commenced by original or not, the bail are entitled to relief (and this is illustrated by Mayfield v. Davison (c) and Green v. Elgie (d)): if the form of action be the same, the plaintiff may recover for a cause of action in respect of which the bail became bound, or for a new cause of action; in the latter case the bail are discharged; Wheelwright v. Jutting (a); in the former, not. The rule upon the subject is, that the alteration shall not operate to prejudice the bail. A rule of K.B. of Easter T. 5 G. 2., cited in Jacob v. Bowes (b), directs, that where the plaintiff recovers a greater sum than is expressed in the process on which he declares, the bail shall be liable for the sum sworn to, and indorsed on the said process, or for any lesser sum which the plaintiff shall recover. The principle of that rule is relied upon by the plaintiffs here. They have recovered partly for the causes of action mentioned in the recognizance; and they have recovered upon those causes of action, and claim against the bail, less than the sum for which the bail became bound. In Gray v. Harvey (c) the defendant was arrested for an alleged debt for goods sold and delivered, and money lent. The declaration contained no count for goods. Littledale J. held, nevertheless, that the bail were not entitled to an exoneration, because the plaintiff might recover on the count for money lent, as far as he could prove.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, contra. The first question is, whether the declaration is not bad, as not shewing any breach of the contract entered into by the bail. What is the contract? It is contained in a recognizance entered into in an action by original, to be answerable in case the defendant shall be convicted "in the plea aforesaid," referring to the original writ, which contains a minute detail of the causes of action. Where the suit is commenced by bill of Middlesex, there is no such minute statement to which reference could be made in the recognizance of bail. The recognizance, therefore, in the one case, is much more definite than in the other. And here the recognizance, as stated in the declaration, recites the causes of action as set out in the original writ, with great particularity: and the condition is, in case Gregory should be convicted, &c., "in the plea aforesaid." Then, has there been judgment "in the plea aforesaid?" or does not the addition of new causes of action destroy the identity of the plea? The bail are supposed to have the original writ read over to them, and to consider of the causes of action, before they bind themselves. If the present defendants had known that new causes of action and new counts might be added, and the amount of damages increased, as was done here, it may be presumed that they would not have entered into the recognizance. The costs at least might be indefinitely increased by such additions. The declaration in scire facias does not expressly state what amendment was permitted by the order of Bayley J. No count of the amended declaration in assumpsit corresponds with any one of the causes of action in the original writ, or any count of the first declaration, as stated in the declaration in scire facias. The costs are entire; and, if the defendants are liable for them at all by the condition of the recognizance, they are liable if any portion of them is unpaid. The question is not, whether the Court has or has not power, as between the parties, to allow additional counts; but whether, as regards the bail, the suit, when such counts are added, and promises alleged to the amount of 3000*l.* instead of 1200*l.*, is the same suit as that described in the recognizance. In this view of the case, the sum actually recovered is immaterial. But the plaintiffs did in fact recover by the verdict a much larger sum than 1200*l.* and costs, which cannot be divided, upon the new as well as the old counts: and the condition of the recognizance is, if Gregory shall not pay the plaintiffs "all such damages, costs, and charges," as shall be adjudged against him in the plea aforesaid. If the plea upon which judgment has been given, as stated in this declaration, is identical with the plea mentioned in the recognizance, and the judgment is good, the execution mentioned at the end of the declaration should issue for the whole sum awarded by the judgment. But the judgment, as stated, is not warranted by the writ.

It has been said that this objection cannot prevail, because it is now held that no advantage can be taken of a defective original, or of a variance between the original and declaration; and it is true that, since the statutes which were cited, this cannot be done after verdict, and that, in earlier stages of a cause, the Court will not grantoyer of the original writ, for the purpose of raising an objection. But it does not follow that the original writ set out in this declaration in scire facias must be considered as supporting the judgment, also set out in it; and that the defendants are precluded from saying that the writ and judgment are not in the same plea. Edwards v. Watkin (a), Berkenhead v. Nuthall (b), Norton v. Palmer (c), shew that where the writ and count have been brought before the Court, a substantial variance (d) between them has been held good ground of error, or for arresting judgment; the verdict being no bar to such an objection at the time when those cases were decided. In Yates v. Plaxton (a), on scire facias against bail, it appeared on the pleadings that the original writ against the principal was sued out in the county of York, and the recovery against him was in the county of the city of York, and judgment was had thereon: the plaintiff pleaded that in such a case the bail were liable, which allegation the defendants traversed; and, the plaintiff having demurred specially, because a traverse was taken on matter of law, the defendants had judgment. That shews that an objection like the present may be taken by bail, where it can be made apparent to the Court that the writ is not in the same plea as the judgment. [Littledale J. Suppose the amendment under the order of Bayley J. had been made by stating that Gregory was indebted in the sum of 1200*l.* on the 1st of January, and 1800*l.* on the 1st of February, thus keeping the two claims perfectly distinct, could your objection have prevailed then?] It would. The plea would not have been that mentioned in the writ. The liability to costs might have been increased indefinitely, and the bail are answerable for the whole. And the risk would still have been enhanced, because it might probably happen, if the demand of the plaintiffs became greater than the principal could satisfy, that he would go away without paying any part of it.

Then, as to the particular pleas. Plea 1. is substantially good, though it might perhaps have been objected to on special demurrer as an informal plea of nul tiel record. Plea 2. pursues (as it ought) the very words of the recognizance. Plea 4. gives a complete

(a) Levin's Entries, 170.

answer to the action. If the causes of action stated in the declaration were not the same as those stated in the original writ, there has been no recovery according to the condition of the recognizance, and it is not forfeited. Plea 6. also gives a valid answer. The fine is paid on the supposition that the plaintiff can recover no more than 1200*l.*; he afterwards proceeds for 3000*l.*, and no fine is paid for the difference. The only proper mode of making the alteration would have been to obtain the leave of the Master of the Rolls to amend the original, and the consent of the bail to raise the amount of the recognizance. [Patteson J. That would have been in effect commencing a new action.] The Court would not have allowed the recognizance to be altered unless the bail had agreed; neither will they allow them to be fixed in the altered amount, without such agreement. As to pleas 7. and 8., the order of Bayley J. for amending is relied upon as answering the objection which arises from the want of consent by the bail. But it ought to be shewn, in strict legal form, that the amendment was made by authority of the Court. The order of a single Judge is not, till it is made a rule of Court, equivalent to that authority, unless where a peculiar effect is given to the order by act of parliament, as in the case of a habeas corpus. Plea 9. raises the question whether bail are to be affected by that which is at least a stretch of the authority of this Court, the ordering continuances to be entered after the proper time. As a question of practice, and as between plaintiff and defendant, it has been held that this may be done; but it is now for the first time to be decided how such entry, appearing on the record, shall operate on the liabilities of bail. As to plea 10., it must be admitted that the plea, as framed, should not have been

been to the whole declaration, because the defendants are liable unless they can shew that the condition has in no respect been broken. But that supports the argument before urged on behalf of the defendants. By the condition of the recognizance all the damages and costs in the plea, to which it refers, must be satisfied, or the defendant in that plea rendered. Now, if the damages and costs so provided for are those recoverable in the plea relied upon by the plaintiffs, and if the defendants cannot discharge themselves without shewing that the condition has been in all respects complied with, their liability has been unjustly extended by the charge made in the declaration. To say that the whole damages and costs are not claimed in the declaration, is no answer, since, according to the argument for the plaintiffs, they were claimable, and the defendants were bound to shew a complete fulfilment of their recognizance.

Sir W. W. Follett in reply. The whole case turns upon the question already decided in Taylor v. Gregory (a), namely, whether the recovery was in that plea in which the bail bound themselves. As to the effect of the Judge's order for amendment, that order was made on payment of costs. [Patteson J. The costs were received under the order; and now the bail say that it was not valid, because not made a rule of Court.] The practice as to amending shews that the addition of counts does not affect the identity of the suit. In actions to recover penalties for usury, such amendments are continually made after the time for commencing an action has elapsed. In Wood v. Grimwood (b) count after count was so added. If any advantage can be taken of the difference between the writ and amended declaration, as an objection to the writ, that is open to the defendants; but the action is the same; and, if the same as to the original defendant, it is so as to the bail. When this case was before the Court on the motion to enter a verdict for the defendants, the facts were not stated on the declaration in scire facias so as to connect the declaration in assumpsit on which the plaintiffs recovered, with the original writ; and the Court gave leave to amend, saying that, if the plaintiffs were right in their action, they could not be wrong in setting out the facts specially. The facts are now set out, and the judgment connected by averment with the writ. As to the cases referred to on the other side, Berkenhead v. Nuthall (a) was decided on stat. 18 Eliz. c. 14. s. 1.; that act cured the want of an original writ, but not a substantial variance. The writ there was for 166*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, the declaration for 171*l.* 10*s.*; that was held fatal, as a variance, the action continuing the same. If the action had been a different one, by reason of the change from 166*l.* to 171*l.*, the objection would have been that, in the new action, there was no original; and that would have been cured by the statute. The same argument applies to Edwards v. Watkin (b). So, it was said by the Court in Norton v. Palmer (c), that the statute 18 Eliz. c. 14. “helps only, where there is not any writ, but not where the writ and declaration varies in substance.” In Johns v. Staynar (d) the writ, which was certified on diminution alleged, appeared to be sued out before the cause of action accrued as stated in the declaration; and, as there was a continuance wanting, the counsel for the plaintiff suggested that another original might have been sued out, which was missing, or that the action proceeded in had been commenced without an original; and he cited Calthorp v. Culpepper (a) and Reynel v. Kelsey (b): but the Court held that, as the writ here was certified as an original in this action, and as it was taken out before the cause of action, it was a vicious and an ill original, not aided by any statute. That illustrates Yates v. Plaxton (c), where, according to the principle of the cases to which it was attempted to assimilate Johns v. Staynar (d), a recovery in the county of the city of York was considered to be no recovery in an action commenced in the county; and the bail in that action were held to be discharged. Subsequently to these cases, by stat. 5 G. 1. c. 13., it was enacted that no judgment should be reversed after verdict, for any defect in form or substance, in any writ, or for any variance in such writs from the declaration or other proceedings. The alteration complained of in the present case would have been such a variance as might have been objected to under stat. 18 Eliz. c. 14., but is cured by stat. 5 G. 1. c. 13.

If the bail are subjected to any hardship in this case, it may be a ground for the equitable interference of the Court, but is no answer to a proceeding on the recognizance. In Taylor v. Gregory (e) the Court held that the bail were not exonerated by the introducing of new causes of action; but they suggested that the new demands might be separated from the former ones. That has been done: this declaration relates to the former demands only. The case of the bail was a second time under the consideration of the Court in Taylor v. Gregory (a), and the rule then made absolute was modified for their protection, but nothing was said of exempting them from liability. The plaintiffs only seek to hold the bail responsible for the amount in which they were so originally. [Patteson J. There might be counts for causes of action not bailable. Littledale J. The recognizance would then be entered on the roll as to the bailable counts only.] Even in such a case the same objection might be raised as the defendants have suggested here; that the costs could not be separated.

As to the pleadings; the defendants ought to have answered the replication to the first plea by traversing the fact of the judgment there alleged; and so, as to the replication to the second plea, if they meant to deny that the causes of action upon which the principal was convicted were the same as those contained in the original, they should have pleaded that as a matter of fact. Such a question is clearly the subject of an issue in fact; Seddon v. Tutop (b), Lord Bagot v. Williams (c); and the defendants here have so treated it in their fourth plea. As to the want of a proper fine, that, if a valid objection, would have been available in former stages of this case, but it has never weighed with the Court. [Littledale J. The want of a fine, if an attempt were made to evade it, would be matter for the attention of the filacer.] With respect to the seventh and eighth pleas, no authority has been shewn for saying that the consent of the bail was necessary to an order for amendment. When bail are to be discharged, the question is, whether they are prejudged by the proceeding (as in Stevenson v. Roche (a)), not whether they have consented to it. As to the Judge's order, it has never been questioned that an order at chambers is as binding on parties as a rule made in Court; though it is not sufficient for the purpose of bringing a person into contempt. The doctrine of amendments at chambers is stated by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Wilkes (b). The objections to the ninth and tenth pleas are not answered.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court. After stating the principal facts as alleged in the declaration in scire facias, his Lordship proceeded:—The defendants pleaded various pleas, stating their defence in various ways, but all, in effect, amounting to this, that, by the changes made by virtue of the above mentioned order of the learned Judge, the suit was no longer that in which the recognizance of bail was entered into, and that they were, thereby, discharged. It is not necessary to allude more particularly to the form of those pleas, because, as has been observed already, the declaration in scire facias states all the facts whereon those pleas rest; and is, therefore (as was contended), upon the face of it, bad in law, if the defence be available.

The question, arising out of the objections presented to our notice in different shapes, is resolved into the single point, already shortly adverted to, whether the recovery against the defendant in the original action was in the same suit as that wherein the defendants entered into the recognizance. To enforce these objections, it has been contended that the liability of the bail has been increased, by enlarging the plaintiffs' means of recovering damages against their principal, and also by increasing the amount of costs. It is observable, however, that, admitting the justice of the observations which have been pressed upon us, they are not precisely directed to, and fall short of, the proposition to be established by the defendants, that the suit had, by the alterations already noticed, changed its character, and no longer remained the same. And, in our opinion, they do not establish that proposition. The suit, as regards the parties engaged in it, and the manner of commencing it, remained unchanged and the same. The alteration in the declaration, by the order alluded to, is, we think, strictly within the controul ordinarily exercised by the Court over the proceedings of the parties, upon terms imposed in each case: it is an amendment, at the discretion of the Court, of the part of the proceedings which is supposed to require it; but it does not destroy the identity of the suit.

In support of the objection to the plaintiffs' recovering, we have been referred to several cases. Upon considering them, however, they do not seem to bear upon the point before us. At the time when they were decided (previous to the several statutes referred to in the argument, and particularly stat. 5 G. 1. c. 13.), a departure from the original writ in the declaration was a fatal objection. That, however, was by no means founded upon the supposition that there was any change of suit, but the contrary. The suit remaining the same, the error was entirely in departure. In the case of Berkenhead v. Nuttall (a) (upon error) the variance was between the amount of debt claimed in the writ, and in the declaration ; in the latter, a larger sum having been claimed ; and, therefore, the judgment was reversed. In the next case cited, of Edwards v. Watkin (a), in trespass, the error was in the excess in the declaration beyond the writ, clausa fregit instead of clausum. The third, and last to be noticed, is the case of Norton v. Palmer (b), which was also decided on the excess of the declaration beyond the writ.

against

The cases cited, therefore, are clearly distinguishable from the present, and proceed upon a principle wholly independent of the present objection, which is, that the variance from the original writ makes the suit other and different.

But we have been further pressed with the consideration, that the costs are entire, and that, because the declaration has been enlarged, and the costs thereby increased, and therefore the responsibility of the bail increased, they are thereby discharged. But, upon this point also, we are of opinion against the defendants. We think that the costs of increase form no integral part of the suit. They are awarded by the Court in consequence of the damages recovered by the plaintiffs in this case, and form the subject of a distinct and separate adjudication upon the recovery of the plaintiffs in the suit. If, therefore, the bail have been, in this respect, aggrieved, the Court, upon application, may relieve them; but they are not, for the reason suggested, discharged upon the whole. Therefore, we are of opinion that judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

The former consideration of this case has not been adverted to, though our present decision seems to be in conformity to the view then taken by the Court.

CLAY against STEPHENSON and Others.

Wednesday,
June 17th.

SIR JOHN CAMPBELL, Attorney-General, had obtained a rule in this term (June 3d) calling upon the defendants to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to issue a commission for the examination of witnesses necessary for his case, residing at Hamburgh, and why in such commission the usual clause rendering the commissioners' oath necessary should not be omitted; or, otherwise, why the commissioners to be named in the said commission should not, if necessary, and in their capacity of commissioners appointed by this Court, and in the name of this Court, be authorised to apply to the Court of Commerce, or the proper tribunal, at Hamburgh, to render the said commission effectual by compelling the attendance of the witnesses, and obliging them to submit to be examined upon oath; and also why, if necessary, a clause authorising such application should not be inserted in the commission.

The affidavits in support of the rule stated, that a commission had issued, directed to certain individuals, to examine the witnesses at Hamburgh; that two witnesses had refused to appear voluntarily before this commission; that the senate of Hamburgh, upon being applied to by the British consul and otherwise, had re-

A commission having issued to examine witnesses at Hamburgh, certain witnesses there refused to appear. On motion in this Court, it was shewn that the Court of Commerce at Hamburgh would compel the attendance of the witnesses before themselves, upon request made by this Court, and would conduct the examination, allowing commissioners named by this Court to be present, and to make suggestions; but that the members of the Court of Commerce would not take a special oath as commissioners of this Court; and that they would not compel the attendance of witnesses before any but themselves; and that there were no means of compelling such attendance.

This Court ordered a commission to issue for the examination of the witnesses, directed to the members of the Court of Commerce, without the usual clause requiring the commissioners to be sworn: Littledale J. dubitante.

fused to enforce their attendance; that the Court of Commerce had also declined enforcing their attendance, and that there were no means of enforcing it: that it had been ascertained that the commission might be made available, if this Court would direct it to the Court of Commerce (Handelsgericht) at Hamburgh, without a clause calling on the latter Court, as commissioners, to take the usual commissioners' oath, and framed as a commission addressed to a Court of judicature to whose acts full faith was due; or if this Court would, by its rule, request the Court of Commerce to give effect to the commission; or if the commissioners to be therein named were authorised by the rule, or commission, to call upon the Court of Commerce, in the name of this Court, to give effect to the commission by compelling the attendance of witnesses. Depositions were also made of belief that the witnesses at Hamburgh were adverse to the plaintiff, and that he would be prevented, by want of their testimony, from proceeding safely to trial. It appeared, by the affidavits of two civilians at Hamburgh, that in Hamburgh, and in Germany generally, the practice is for courts, requiring the testimony of witnesses out of their jurisdiction, to address a request to a competent Court within whose jurisdiction the witnesses are domiciled; that German Courts are in the habit of complying with such requests; and that the Court of Commerce would undoubtedly comply with such a request from this Court, and would themselves conduct the examination, allowing the attendance of the commissioners to suggest questions, in case of an attempt to give evasive answers: but that the Court of Commerce would not delegate its duties to others, and that the members of it would not take a special oath.

Wightman

Wightman now shewed cause. It is proposed that a court, over which this Court has no controul, should be requested to attend to a suit not within its own jurisdiction. The refusal of persons abroad to submit to examination is not a new case; but this method of meeting the difficulty has never been adopted. The proposal to dispense with an oath is unwarranted; and the precedent would be mischievous. Nor is the application sanctioned by st. 1 W. 4. c. 22. That act (sect. 1.) extends the power which the Court possessed as to the examination of witnesses in India, under st. 13 G. 3. c. 63. s. 44., to all colonies and places under the dominion of his Majesty in foreign parts, and also to the Judges of the several Courts therein. The second section gives to such Judges the power which they would have in causes depending in their own courts; but it applies only to courts in places under the dominion of his Majesty. The fourth section empowers the Courts here to order a commission for the examination of witnesses upon oath, at any place out of the jurisdiction of these Courts; and, by the same, or any subsequent order, to give such directions touching the time, place, and manner, of the examination, within or without such jurisdiction, and all other matters and circumstances connected with such examinations, as may appear reasonable and just. This section may be relied on in support of the rule. But the present application is not for a commission, in the sense in which the word is used in the act: it is really an application that a foreign court should be requested to exercise its own compulsory power, and that, for that purpose, the commissioners' oath should be dispensed with. It is not like the case of a mandamus to a functionary within his Majesty's dominions, where it is assumed that reliance may be placed on the officer to whom the mandamus is directed.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, contra. All that is asked for is a commission to individuals, who happen to be Judges of the Court of Commerce at Hamburgh. It is not proposed that the commission should be directed to them in that character. The commission here applied for is to be in the common form, omitting only the oath, to which the proposed commissioners feel objections. It is as if they were Quakers or Moravians. The fourth section fully warrants the application: the question is merely as to the "manner of such examination;" and it was probably for the purpose of meeting difficulties like the present that the discretion allowed by that section was granted. If this proposal be acceded to, the other alternative in the application will become unnecessary, yet even that seems warranted by the fourth section. [Patteson J. The forty-fourth section of stat. 13 G. 3. c. 64., gives no form, and does not require the commissioners to be sworn; and a mandamus would require no administration of an oath.] Faith is, in fact, given to the judicial functionary.

LORD DENMAN C. J. I think that what is required may be done. The words of the statutes do not require an oath to be taken by the commissioners; and the fourth section of stat. 1 W. 4. c. 22. enables us to regulate the manner of proceeding, upon reasonable grounds. It does seem to me a reasonable ground for our making this order, that truth may be got at which would otherwise be lost. I think a court of equity would have felt itself entitled to act in the same way.

LITLEDALE J. I must own I have great doubts. Certainly the oath is not prescribed, yet it was never dispensed with before. But, as my Lord and my learned brothers see no difficulty, the rule must be granted.

1835.

PATTESON J. I think the rule may be granted.

WILLIAMS J. I see no danger in this proceeding. That there is no precedent, arises, probably, from such a case not having occurred.

Wightman then applied for costs, on the ground of this being an indulgence, and the rule having prayed for too much.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, opposed the application. The rule did not pray for more than is granted : the other branch was in the alternative.

Per Curiam. The costs must be costs in the cause, under s. 9. of stat. 1 W. 4. c. 22.

The rule was as follows : —“ It is ordered, that a commission issue, directed to the Court of Commerce at Hamburg, in which commission the usual clause rendering the commissioners’ oath necessary shall be omitted, for the purpose of examining upon oath Vincent Elias Hermann Langnese, and Johann Martin Precht, of the city of Hamburg, witnesses on the part of the plaintiff, upon interrogatories to be exhibited to them before the said Court ; and the said Court is hereby empowered to perform all such matters and things as are required and authorised by the statute of

M^cDOUGALL against NICHOLLS.Wednesday,
June 17th.

IN the year 1834, Taunton J. ordered four bills of costs to be delivered by Mr. Nias, who had acted as attorney for the plaintiff, to be taxed by the Master. The attorney produced before the Master evidence to shew that two of these had been taxed and paid. The Master not having made any allocatur, and expressing a doubt as to the effect of the order, so far as these two bills were concerned, Mr. Nias took out a summons, calling upon Mr. Green, the plaintiff's then attorney, to shew cause why the order of Taunton J. should not be rescinded or amended; and Coleridge J., before whom the summons was heard, indorsed on the summons a minute that Mr. Nias should deliver the two bills in three days, the parties undertaking, to the Master's satisfaction, that payment should be made, as the case might be, within seven days from the date of the allocatur. Mr. Nias, not being satisfied with the decision, did not draw up the order, but retained the summons and indorsement; and the Judge's clerk declined to draw up the order without them. Mr. Nias refused to deliver them up, but offered that the case should be reheard before the learned Judge; to which the other side did not assent. In this term Sewell obtained a rule calling upon Mr. Nias to shew cause why he should not draw up the order, or produce to the Judge's clerk the summons with the original order thereon indorsed; or why, in default thereof, the Judge's clerk should not draw up the order from the

A party taking out a summons for an order to be made by a Judge at chambers, may abandon the order when made. Therefore, where a Judge at chambers had indorsed on the summons the minutes of an order, and the party taking out the summons refused to draw up the order, or to deliver up the indorsed summons, the Court refused to compel him to do either, or to direct the Judge's clerk to draw up the order from the minutes of counsel.

Platt now shewed cause. There is no authority for such an application as this. Any party applying for an order, who is dissatisfied with the terms on which it is made, may refuse to draw it up.

Sewell contrà. The question is, whether a party, after he has, upon his own application, attended a Judge, and after the minutes of the order have been made, can refuse to abide by the result. He may not be bound to draw up the order himself; but the opposite party is entitled to have it drawn up. It is res judicata as much as an allocatur: and the other party is not to be driven to take out a fresh summons. An allocatur is the property of the party in whose favour it is made; Doe dem. King v. Robinson (a). Mr. Nias, therefore, has, at any rate, no right to retain the summons and minutes.

LORD DENMAN. C. J. A party who applies for an order is not bound, if he does not like the order made, to have it drawn up. It is said that this is res judicata, and it may possibly be so; but that is of no importance. The successful party, if he choose, may take out a summons to obtain an order. The case of an allocatur is altogether different.

LITTLEDALE J. I think that a party obtaining an order may always abandon it.

(a) 2 Dowl. Pr. C. 503.

PATTERSON J. I always have thought so, and I have acted upon the opinion. But, if matter be gone into by consent of parties, it may perhaps become res judicata.

THE defendants were indicted in the Central Criminal Court. The indictment contained twelve counts, and charged various nuisances created by the produce of certain gas works, corrupting the waters of the Thames, destroying the fish there, and rendering the air unwholesome. The nuisances were variously described; and the first three counts charged them as committed in the parish of St. Mary Lambeth, in Surrey; the three next as committed in the parish of St. Mary Battersea, in Surrey; the seventh, ninth, and eleventh as committed, as well in the parish of St. Mary Lambeth, in Surrey, as in the parish of St. Mary Battersea, in Surrey; the eighth, tenth, and twelfth, as committed in the county of Middlesex. The indictment was removed by certiorari; and, in this term, Curwood obtained a rule, drawn up on reading the indictment only, calling on the prosecutors to shew cause why they should not give to the defendants, or their attorney, a note of the several acts of nuisance which they intended to prove.

An indictment for a nuisance contained twelve counts, describing the nuisance in different ways, and charging it to have been committed in different parishes and counties within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court. This Court, on reading the indictment only (which had been removed by certiorari, and without affidavit, ordered the prosecutor to give the defendant a note of the several acts of nuisance which he intended to prove.

R. V. Richards now shewed cause. This is an unprecedented application. In Rex v. The Marquis of Downshire (a), which was an indictment for obstruction of highways, a single Judge ordered that particulars should be furnished; but he required strong affidavits: and a map, shewing the roads and the nature of the question, was laid before him. Here there is nothing but the indictment; and the same application might be made in every case of indictment for nuisance.

Curwood, contra. The principle of the application is not new. In Hawkins's chapter on Barratry, it is said (b), "Also it seemeth to be a settled practice not to suffer the prosecutor to go on in the trial of an indictment of this kind, without giving the defendant a note of the particular matters which he intends to prove against him; for otherwise it will be impossible to prepare a defence against so general and uncertain a charge, which may be proved by such a multiplicity of different instances." That principle applies in the present case. A similar application was granted, on the Oxford circuit, in the case of an indictment for embezzlement (c). As to the want of an affidavit (d), the complaint of the defendant arises entirely on the indictment.

LORD DENMAN C. J. We think the application reasonable.

THE proceedings in this case (viz., 1. A conviction of forcible detainer, dated September 3d 1834, alleging an entry, and unlawful amotion, on the 28th of August; 2. An inquisition taken thereon, dated September 10th 1834; 3. A memorandum of restitution, of the same date, indorsed on the inquisition;) being before the Court by return to a writ of certiorari (see Rex v. Wilson, 1 A. & E. 627. (a)),

A conviction for an unlawful detainer is bad, if it only state that the prosecutor complained to the justices of an entry and unlawful expulsion and forcible detainer, and that they personally came and found the defendant forcibly detaining the premises, whereupon they convict him, &c. For the justices cannot know, by their view, without evidence, that the detainer was unlawful, or that there had been an unlawful entry.

Semble, per Lord Denman C. J., that the conviction should set out the facts from which the unlawfulness of the detainer is inferred.

Semble, that such conviction ought to shew that the defendant was summoned, or had otherwise an opportunity to defend himself.

At the time of the above conviction, the defendant tendered to the justices a traverse of the force complained of; and, a few days after, an inquisition was held before the magistrates for the purpose of trying the alleged force by a jury, who, after hearing evidence adduced by both parties, found the defendant guilty; and the magistrates then gave restitution. A return was made to this Court, on certiorari, of the conviction and inquisition. The latter was entitled an inquisition indented and taken, &c., by the oaths of twelve &c., before &c., who say, upon their oaths aforesaid, that &c.: stating an unlawful entry and detainer, but not reciting any complaint made by the prosecutors.

Held, that the inquisition was founded on the conviction, and could not be sustained, the conviction being void; and that the inquisition, even if looked at alone, was bad, as it did not state any complaint, nor by what authority the jury was summoned.

Held, further, that the Court was bound to award a re-restitution, as a consequence of quashing the conviction, without inquiring into the legal or equitable claims of the respective parties.

The proceedings being returned by certiorari, and the conviction being, upon a concilium and argument, pronounced bad, the Court would not, as a consequence of that judgment, quash the inquisition also, but heard its validity separately discussed on motion.

Hill, on a former day of this term (a), moved (on concilium) that the conviction might be quashed. The grounds of motion are, first, that no unlawful entry appears to have been averred in the information; secondly, that no evidence of such entry appears to have been given before the justices; thirdly, that the conviction does not find an unlawful entry. The conviction states that the justices found Wilson forcibly detaining; but they could not know, from their view of that fact, how he had entered. Rex v. Oakley (b) must govern this case. Sir W. W. Follett, contra. This is a good conviction under stats. 5 R. 2. st. 1. c. 8., 15 R. 2. c. 2., and 8 H. 6. c. 9. Rex v. Oakley (b) is no authority to the contrary. There it did not appear either by the information, as recited in the conviction, or by the conviction itself, either that the defendant had unlawfully entered, or that he was not the rightful owner; nor was any fact alleged to shew that he had unlawfully held possession, or kept any person out. He might have been holding his own. Patteson J. there pointed out, as the mischief which stat. 8 H. 6. c. 9. was intended to remedy, that "a party who had acquired the possession of lands peaceably though unlawfully, might afterwards detain them forcibly:" he referred to the precedent in Rex v. Etwell (c). The principle of Rex v. Oakley (b) is, that the statute of Hen. 6. shall not be executed against a man forcibly holding property which he is entitled to, against a wrong-doer. gistrates saw him unlawfully, with strong hand, detaining the premises, according as the parties laying the information had complained. The defendant could not, on this statement, have been holding what he was entitled to. It cannot be necessary that the actual entry should have been unlawful, if the holding clearly is so: as for instance, if a party enters by license, and then expels the tenant, and holds by force. One of the precedents in 2 Burn's Justice, tit. Forcible Entry and Detainer, IX. No. 5. (a) is adapted to such a case, and follows, as the present conviction does (in all the statement now in question) the precedent in Rex v. Elwell (b). The objection that no evidence of an unlawful entry appears to have been given before the Justices, is answered by the former case of Rex v. Wilson (c). In the inquisition no defect is pointed out. [Patteson J. I did not mean to say, in Rex v. Oakley (d), that the precedent in Rex v. Elwell (b) was good. How can a magistrate, by his own view of the detainer, know the previous circumstances? Lord Denman C. J. The view cannot shew how the party obtained possession. In the former case of Rex v. Wilson (c), we did not decide that the justices might properly convict upon their own view of the holding, but only that a mandamus to set out evidence was not wanted]. Here they do not proceed merely upon their own view, but upon the information of the complainants. [Patteson J. That is mere assertion; then, because the justices see the party holding possession, they take it for granted that the statement is true]. The statute 8 H. 6. c. 9. s. 2. says, that where any doth make forcible entry into lands, "or them hold forcibly, after complaint thereof made" to the justices by the party grieved, the justices shall put the statute in execution. The object of the statute was to prevent breaches of the peace; and it is sufficient if the justices, after complaint made, find the party complained against holding with a strong hand even what he claims to be lawfully possessed of. [Patteson J. Such a statute would be in favour of trespassers. Lord Denman C. J. If there be evidence that the party entered unlawfully, the view of the justices will supply the fact of his forcibly continuing to hold: that does no violence to common sense; but an immense violence is done to it by saying that, upon complaint made, the mere fact of a party's defending his possession shall be proof of an unlawful detainer.] Still it may be a question, whether the complaint may not be made without oath. [Lord Denman C. J. Where would such proceedings end? If Wilson is now put out, he may give information to the justices against the present complainants, and if they are found defending their possession, it may be said that that is a forcible detainer by them.] Justices present highways upon their view; yet they cannot know by the view what are highways; they must have other information. In Rex v. Oakley (a) the present objection was not taken; nor was any intimation given by the Court that proof of an unlawful entry was necessary, independently of the complaint laid before the justices, or that a conviction stating the facts as in Rex v. Ehwel (b) would not be approved of. In Regina v. Layton (c) the defendant was convicted, on view, of a forcible detainer; and, on habeas corpus, one objection taken was "that the complaint was of a forcible entry and detainer, and here is no forcible entry at all; and a man's house is his castle, which it is lawful for him to defend with force;" and the Court took time to consider. In Hawk. P. C. b. 1. c. 64. s. 40., 7th ed. (after stating that a conviction of forcible detainer is not good unless a forcible entry be shewn) it is said, "yet in Leighton's case it was resolved, that such a forcible entry is sufficiently set forth in the complaint recited in such conviction." The right of a party to defend his own seems to be provided for by 8 H. 6. c. 9. s. 7. which enacts that they who keep their possessions with force in lands whereof they or their ancestors, &c., have continued their possessions by three years or more, be not endamaged by force of the statute.

Lord DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court as follows: This is a conviction by two justices of the peace, who recite that Thomas Bates and John Stiles had complained to them that John Wilson into the messuage of them the said Bates and Stiles did enter, and them the said Bates and Stiles of the said messuage whereof they were seised to them and their heirs, in their demesne as of fee, unlawfully ejected, expelled, and amoved, and the said messuage from them, the said B. and S., unlawfully, with strong hand and armed power, doth yet hold and from them detain, against the form of the statute; whereupon the said B. and S. prayed the said justices that a due remedy might be provided for them according to the statute: which complaint and prayer being heard, the said justices personally sonally came and then found and saw the said John Wilson the aforesaid messuage with force and arms unlawfully, with strong hand and armed power, detaining, against the form of the statute, as the said B. and S. had complained: therefore it is considered, that the said John Wilson of the detaining aforesaid with strong hand, by our own proper view, is convicted, according to the form of the statute; whereupon the said justices set upon him a fine of 5*l.*, and do cause him then and there to be arrested: and the said J. W. being convicted, upon our own proper view, of the detaining aforesaid with strong hand as aforesaid, is, by the said justices, committed to the county gaol, there to abide until he shall have paid the said fine.

WILSON.

Then follows an inquisition, by twelve good and lawful men, before the same justices and another, who say, that the said J. W. into the said messuage, whereof B. and S. were lawfully and peaceably seised in fee, unlawfully did enter, and the said B. and S. of the messuage aforesaid unlawfully ejected, expelled, and amoved, and the said messuage from the said B. and S. unlawfully, with strong hand and armed power, did hold and from them detain.

On the inquisition is indorsed a memorandum of restitution made by the same three justices to Bates and Stiles.

This conviction has been questioned before us on the ground that no unlawful entry is averred even in the information, or proved by evidence, or adjudged by the justices. And we are of opinion that the conviction is bad for these reasons; perhaps for some others also.

The justices have proceeded on the statute 8 H. 6., following up two statutes of Richard 2.; the object of which, according to Hawkins, is to prevent breaches of the peace by parties forcibly asserting their own rights. The earliest statute merely prohibits the offence of forcible entry on pain of imprisonment; the second gives summary power to the justices; the third extends the remedy to cases where the entry may have been peaceable, but is followed up by a forcible detainer.

In the case of Rex v. Oakley (a) we had to consider of a conviction precisely similar to the present, except that it neither averred an unlawful entry nor an unlawful expulsion; the present conviction alleging the latter only. We all agreed (Parke J. indeed not without some hesitation) that, though by the third statute above mentioned the original entry need not be forcible, it must have been unlawful, to give the magistrates jurisdiction. We see no reason now for entertaining a different opinion; for otherwise the manifest consequence would be that a party seized in fee and unlawfully dispossessed, who should afterwards peaceably recover his possession and maintain it by force, might be ejected, fined, and imprisoned, by two justices. But the statutes will not be found to invest them with such a power. The 5 Ric. 2. st. 1. c. 8. is in these terms: "the King defendeth, that none from henceforth make any entry into any lands and tenements, but in case where entry is given by the law; and in such case not with strong hand," &c. "and if any man from henceforth do to the contrary, and thereof be duly convicted, he shall be punished" &c. The 15 Ric. 2. c. 2. requires that the former statute be carried into effect, and further, that at all times when such forcible entry shall be made, and complaint thereof come to the justices of peace, they shall go to the place, and commit the offender to prison. The statute 8 Hen. 6. c. 9. gives the like remedy in the case there described. The foundation of the proceeding, then, is not the complaint, but the fact; a fact which we think should be proved to the satisfaction of those who are to exercise the power, and appear on the face of the conviction.

In what I am reported to have said in Rex v. Oakley (a) it appears that I had thought the justices had there adjudged the keeping out to be unlawful, and that I held the adjudication bad, for want of specifying the facts from which its unlawfulness was inferred. Speaking for myself, I think that holding correct, though not necessary for deciding that case or the present. For, in the conviction before us, the party interested is said to have complained (not even upon oath) that he was expelled: but the justices heard no evidence and came to no other decision on the fact than this, that finding and seeing the defendant unlawfully with strong and armed force holding possession, "it is considered that J. W., of the detaining aforesaid with strong hand by our own proper view is convicted:" he is then sentenced to fine and imprisonment.

Now, it is plain that the view of the justices, though it might embrace a forcible detainer, could give them no information as to its unlawfulness. The fact, of which they are eye witnesses, is in its own nature indifferent, as the rightful owner, in peaceable possession, may be seen defending his possession by force, and would be justified in so doing unless his possession were unlawful. If it were, that should be proved to the justices and adjudged by them.

A substantial doubt of the goodness of the conviction arises here, from its not shewing that the party was summoned or had the opportunity of defending himself against the ex parte charge. Hawkins (a) lays it down that this is necessary with reference to another provision of 8 Hen. 6. "As the justice is bound to stay the award of restitution, upon the defendant's tendering a traverse of the force, so it hath also been said, that he ought not to make such an award in any case in the defendant's absence, without calling him to answer for himself; for it is implied by natural justice, in the construction of all laws, that no one ought to suffer any prejudice thereby, without having first an opportunity of defending himself." For this he quotes Savile, 68., where Wray C. J., speaking of his own practice under 8 Hen. 6., said, that he never useth to grant restitution without hearing the party indicted. Hawkins cites also Aleyn 78., where Rolle C. J. agreed that one may be indicted for not taking the oath of headborough, when duly appointed, "but then he ought to be warned to appear before a justice of peace, there to take his oath, and for want of that," and for another objection, the indictment was quashed. My Brother Parke observed in Rex v. Oakley (b) that, when a complaint is made, the party has the opportunity of traversing the facts, and must be taken to admit them, if he omit to do so. But, in the present case, if not in every similar case, the party had no such opportunity, not having been present when the complaint was made. He could not then traverse the complaint, nor could he confront the witnesses, for none were examined, nor was he summoned. Every thing is done behind his back, till he is found and seen detaining the possession, whereupon he is arrested and imprisoned. When the inquisition is thereupon found, that may indeed be traversed by the party: and, according to C. J. Wray, he must be summoned, before the award of restitution. The disadvantage under which he will dispute the facts, if already thrown into prison, need not be dwelt upon, and there seems no stronger reason for summoning him in the last stage to defend his property, than in the first, when he may be deprived of his liberty and fined. This objection however is not among the points set down for argument, nor one of those on which the judgment of the Court is founded.

(b) 4 B. & Ad. 312. 1 Nov. & M. 65.

The precedents and authorities were supposed to sanction the present conviction: but they are very scanty; and indeed Layton's Case (a) may almost be said to stand alone. That was a conviction by the Lord Mayor, for a forcible detainer, after a forcible entry, of the Fleet Prison, by which Layton was fined 100*l.* and imprisoned quousque. One objection was that it did not negative three years' peaceable possession; but this was held unnecessary, because that is matter of defence given by a proviso. The Court also said that the conviction was traversable because the party is to be imprisoned. But this is no authority for asserting that a complaint alone is sufficient to warrant a conviction; and, if it were, it would only prove the conviction bad for want of summoning the party to answer such complaint. With regard to the particular point raised here, on which we decided the King v. Oakley (b), viz. the want of averring that the defendant's entry was either forcible or illegal, no judgment was given. "Sir James Montague took exceptions," "that the complaint was of a forcible entry and detainer, and here is no forcible entry at all; and a man's house is his castle, which it is lawful for him to defend with force. Curia advisare vult." Thus far the report. Mr. Dealtry has found the warrant for Layton's commitment to Newgate, bearing date March 27th, 1705. The objection we are now considering certainly appears upon the face of it, and must have been overruled by the great authority of Holt, if this Court ultimately committed Layton by virtue of it. This fact however is not certain, nor very probable. For the commitment just referred to is undoubtedly imperfect, being for an indefinite period, and no fine being imposed. But we have been furnished from the same quarter with a second commitment, dated a week later, and executed in all probability when the defects of the first were discovered. In this the Lord Mayor says that he has fined the parties 100*l.* each; but the offence, of which on his own view he convicts them, is that of riot and forcible detainer. This is manifestly the conviction reported by Salkeld, on which the Court took time to consider. But the records of this Court farther shew that Layton and the others were ordered to find bail to answer an indictment preferred against them at the Old Bailey sessions on the 18th April, 1705, for a riot and assault in the Fleet. It does not appear that they found bail, and in Easter Term of the same year they were committed to the Marshal. As we find no farther record of these proceedings, they probably were not pressed to a legal decision, and it remains at least doubtful whether the imprisonment was upon the summary conviction or for want of bail.

Layton

Layton had been warden of the Fleet, and forfeited the office in 1699 by a judgment which was affirmed in Parliament in 1704. He had the office again granted to him in January 1707. Taken altogether, these circumstances wear the appearance of a compromise.

In Rex v. Elwell (a) a conviction very like the present was brought before the Court and quashed. The objection was that imprisonment was awarded till fine paid, and no fine set. The form of that conviction is copied into Burn's Justice from the third volume of Lord Raymond (b), and was contrasted by my brother Patteson, in Rex v. Oakley (c), with that which was then held bad on another ground. It was thence inferred that he approved of the form in Rex v. Elwell (a) in every other particular; but surely no mode of arguing can be less just. One fatal objection is sufficient in each of these cases; and, in deciding Rex v. Oakley (d), it was not necessary to enter into that now before us.

The fact appears to be that summary convictions on these statutes were at all times of rare occurrence, and that parties were in the habit of proceeding to obtain restitution by the safer course of indictment. But far greater precision was required in the form of the indictment than is found in this summary conviction: see Fitzwilliams's Case (e), and many other cases collected in Viner's Abridgment, tit. Forcible Entry, and in 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. p. 495. (g).

Upon the whole, we think the conviction bad for these reasons, and it follows that the inquisition founded upon it must also be quashed.

(The Court, however, being afterwards of opinion, that the inquisition could not regularly be quashed on the present proceeding, there being no rule before the Court for that purpose, the judgment was entered for quashing the conviction only).

Conviction quashed.

A rule was obtained in Michaelmas term 1835, calling on the prosecutors to shew cause why the inquisition should not be quashed, and a writ of re-restitution awarded. The motion was grounded upon affidavits filed in this case on former occasions, by which the following facts, among others, appeared. Wilson claimed the premises as heir at law; Bates and Stiles under a will. On the 28th of August 1832, they entered during Wilson's absence, claiming to take possession; but on his return they were induced to depart, it being agreed that a meeting should be held for a settlement, if possible, of the dispute. On the 3d of September, Wilson, hearing that proceedings were about to be taken against him for a forcible detainer, attended without summons at the town hall of Market Harborough, where the magistrates were in the habit of assembling; and an information was then exhibited against him by Bates and Stiles, before two justices, Messrs. Griffin and Brooke, for forcibly detaining the above-mentioned premises. Witnesses were examined in support of the information, but the magistrates refused to allow Wilson's attorney to cross examine, or to produce witnesses on his behalf, alleging that the then proceeding was ex parte. The magistrates afterwards proceeded, with the attorney's clerk who attended for Bates and Stiles, to the dwelling-house, part of the premises in dispute, where Wilson's wife and family family then were, Wilson being absent. The door was fastened; but, on a threat to break in, and at the desire of Mr. Brooke, the wife opened it. The affidavits on Wilson's part denied any use of force in resisting, or violent conduct afterwards; but on the latter point there were contradictory statements. Wilson came upon the premises after the magistrates had entered; and, upon his saying that he would not give up the premises unless compelled by law, the magistrates ordered a constable to apprehend him. He then served one of them with the following notice. "I do hereby give you notice not to trespass upon the premises in Market Harborough, now in my occupation; and further, as I understand you, as a magistrate, with your assistants, intend to enter upon the same premises, and dispossess me thereof, that I traverse the force alleged to have been used by me, touching the possession of the said premises; and that Messrs. Stiles and Bates, who I hear claim title thereto, never were in the possession of the said premises; but that they intruded themselves thereupon when part of my family and my servants were in possession of such premises, and when I myself was attending the funeral of my mother, and stated that they would use force to turn me out; and that I am prepared with evidence to support these facts, and now tender my witnesses to you for examination; and that if, after this, you dispossess me, or interfere with me in any respect, touching the possession of the said premises, you will do so at your peril. John Wilson."

The magistrates, about an hour afterwards, returned to the town-hall, where Wilson was brought before them, in custody, and informed that they had convicted him, on their view, of a forcible detainer, and had fined him

5*L*, and that, in default of payment, he would be committed. They refused to hear any defence, stating that their own view was sufficient ground for a conviction. Wilson proposed to enter into recognizances to try the validity of the conviction and pay the fine and costs if it were confirmed; but the justices refused to accept this offer, and made out a warrant for Wilson's committal, which, however, they permitted to remain in the constable's hands, unenforced, till the following Tuesday, when they said they should again be assembled; and Wilson was set at liberty, but a sheriff's officer was placed upon the premises. On the Tuesday, September 10th, an inquisition was held at the town-hall, before Mr. Griffin, Mr. Brooke, and a third magistrate, Mr. Wetherall, for the purpose of trying the traverse of the force alleged to have been committed by Wilson. Upon this occasion, Bates and Stiles produced the will upon which they relied, and adduced other evidence, including the conviction of Wilson, all of which was objected to by him, but was admitted by the magistrates. Wilson cross-examined, and also called witnesses of his own to negative the violence imputed to him. The information, which lay on the magistrates' table, and was admitted by them to be the information and complaint upon which they proceeded, was objected to on Wilson's behalf, as not alleging an unlawful entry; but the objection was overruled. The jury found Wilson guilty of an illegal detainer (a); and the magistrates then turned his family out of the premises, and indorsed a memorandum of restitution on the inquisition (b). Bates and Stiles had never, before these proceedings, had possession of the premises, but they had been occupied by Wilson. Some statements were added, in the affidavits, on Wilson's part, as to his title, and the alleged invalidity of the will. In Trinity term, 1836 (a),

Sir W. W. Follett shewed cause. The judgment at first given in this case, when the conviction was quashed, that the inquisition should be quashed also, was extrajudicial, and ought not now to have any weight. The conviction may be bad, and yet the inquisition valid. The conviction was for the purpose of arresting and fining the defendant, under stats. 15 Rich. 2. c. 2., and 8 Hen. 6. c. 9. sects. 1, 2. That was a proceeding on the 3d of September by two justices, finding an entry and unlawful detainer, on complaint and on their own view. The inquisition is wholly independent of the conviction; it is for the purpose of restitution under stat. 8 Hen. 6. c. 9. sects. 2, 3.; it is taken on the 10th of September, before a jury, on examination of witnesses and hearing of the defendant; and they find, not only an unlawful detainer, but an unlawful entry. The finding of an unlawful entry is distinct from that of an unlawful detainer, and might be separately proceeded upon, under sect. 3. of the statute. The course taken here has been regular, according to that section, and authorizes the magistrates to give restitution, although there may previously have been an insufficient conviction. The authorities formerly cited do not affect this case. A re-restitution is prayed; but the granting of this is not "ex rigore juris;" the power to grant it is vested in the Court only by an equitable construction of the statutes, and is never exercised but when, upon a consideration of the whole circumstances, the defendant appears to have some right to the tenements; 1 Russ. on Crimes, 293. Where the first restitution was tortious, re-restitution is to be granted of right; otherwise it is discretionary; Rex v. Harris (a). (He then commented on the facts of the present case, with reference to this point).

Hill, contra. It was clearly the opinion of the Court, upon the former decision in this case, that the inquisition ought to be quashed with the conviction; their refraining so to quash it was upon a point of practice, it being suggested that, on the concilium, the inquisition was not before them for this purpose. The inquisition was, in fact, merely ancillary. It arose upon the traverse of the force, tendered by Wilson at the time of the conviction. The affidavits clearly trace the connection of the two proceedings. That which is called a conviction in this case is not to be considered, with reference to practice, like the summary convictions now in use. When the statute of Hen. 6. was passed, the power of justices to convict out of sessions on evidence had not been established, nor was it clearly so till after the stat. 33 H. 8. c. 6., 1 Paley on Convictions, Introduction, p. xxix. 2d ed. Until that power was established, justices out of sessions could convict only on confession or on view, and their conviction on view was traversable. The difficulty as to Regina v. Layton (b) has arisen from the conviction being dealt with upon the same principles as a modern summary conviction. The

(a) 1 Ld. Raym. 482.(b) 1 Salk. 106, 353.

Lord Mayor there had convicted on his view, reciting a complaint made before him of a forcible entry, and that was not traversed. And, as it appeared by the finding in the conviction that there had been a valid complaint, and no traverse was taken on that finding, the conviction was ultimately affirmed, Queen v. Leighton (a); though, in the judgment of this Court on quashing the present conviction, it was conjectured that no decision had taken place. The inquisition, then, in this case, though it appears a substantive proceeding, is merely a kind of issue, arising out of the conviction, for the trial of a fact there suggested, and which the defendant wishes to dispute. The affidavits shew how it originated. But, further, if the inquisition be an independent proceeding, it is defective on the face of it, inasmuch as it does not state a complaint made. The words of 8 Hen. 6. c. 9. s. 2. "That from henceforth where any doth make any forcible entry in lands and tenements, or other possessions, or them hold forcibly, after complaint thereof made within the same county where such entry is made, to the justices of peace, or to one of them, by the party grieved," extend both to the proceeding by conviction next referred to, and to that by inquisition, directed by the following section. Neither proceeding is to originate with the justices; each must be grounded on a complaint. [Patteson J. Has the jury upon the inquisition any thing to do with the complaint?] It is necessary, to give jurisdiction under the statute, and ought therefore to be stated, to shew that the statute has been regularly pursued. This is analogous to the rule now prevailing as to summary convictions. If the jurisdiction do not appear, the conviction is bad, and cannot be helped by affidavit. It is true that the complaint is no part of the finding of the jury; but the justices return, with the inquisition, a memorandum in the nature of a caption, and that ought to state the matter necessary to give jurisdiction. [Littledale J. It seems by the inquisition that they profess to act merely on their own authority. Looking at the inquisition and at the statute, I begin to think that the proceeding is defective as you say. At first I thought that the inquisition was perfect in itself.] As to re-restitution, it may be admitted that the law is as stated in 1 Russ. on Crimes, 293., from Hawk. Pl. Cr., Book 1. c. 64. s. 65. But here the equity is with the defendant. (He then commented on the affidavits as to this point.)

Sir W. W. Follett. In 2 Burn's Justice, tit. Forcible Entry and Detainer, s. VI. (a), it said (upon the words "complaint by the party grieved,") "Yet these words do not enforce any necessity of such a complaint; for it is holden, that the justice may and ought to proceed upon any information or knowledge thereof whatsoever, though no complaint at all be brought unto him by any party grieved thereby;" and Lambard 147 (b) is cited. And the form (No. 9.) of an inquisition, under the same head, says nothing of a complaint.

against
WILSON.

In this case, which has been before the Court on a former occasion, we are moved to quash an inquisition, and award a writ of re-restitution, in pursuance of our former judgment, which set aside the conviction of the defendant by magistrates for the offence of a forcible entry, and in which we expressed an opinion that the inquisition founded upon it must also be set aside. The grounds of that judgment were fully stated, and have not been questioned in the argument on this rule; but it was said that, however defective the conviction, the inquisition, being the act of a jury regularly brought together, and the result of an examination of witnesses at which both parties assisted, ought not to be set aside. We are however of opinion, that as the inquisition was founded on the conviction, which turns out to be a complete nullity, for reasons which it is unnecessary now to repeat, the inquisition also is a proceeding without any warrant of law, and must be set aside. Whether it may have any effect as evidence in other controversies between the parties, we need not consider now. But, indeed, the inquisition is in every other respect wholly inoperative, its use being to give effect to a conviction, which is of course impossible where the conviction itself is void. If it could be permitted to stand as a part of the proceedings, it would appear to justify the transfer of the possession worked by the conviction, when the conviction itself is given up as indefensible, which cannot be permitted. And the inquisition, if taken by itself without reference to the conviction, is in itself defective, inasmuch as it does not shew that any complaint had been made, nor by what authority or on what account the jury were summoned.

But the defendant would gain nothing by our judgment, if we should merely declare the proceedings null: another step is necessary on the part of the Court, in order that full justice may be done him.

If we allow him to remain dispossessed of the premises held before, full effect will be given to an act which we have pronounced wrongful.

A writ of re-restitution is prayed, to prevent this consequence; and the original complainant has stated his objections to our awarding that writ. On looking into the authorities (a), we find that the Court has been in the habit of awarding that writ, when it has quashed the conviction for forcible entry; otherwise the whole proceeding here would be nugatory; and the practice is accordingly said to have grown out of an equitable construction of the statutes.

It has been said that the Court will not do this unless the party unlawfully dispossessed should appear to have title to the premises,—a most inconvenient inquiry upon affidavit, and a course full of danger to the public peace, as protecting the execution of an unlawful sentence. But in Rex v. Jones (b) the Court declared, even where the conviction was quashed for a merely technical error, and the lease of the dispossessed person had expired during the litigation, “that they had no discretionary power in the case, but were bound to award restitution on quashing the conviction.”

This rule therefore for quashing the inquisition must be made absolute, and re-restitution will also be awarded.

Rule accordingly.

FARLEY and Others, Executors, against JOHN WILLIAM BRIANT and Others. Wednesday, June 17th.

DEBT, by the executors and executrix of Sir Thomas Hussey Apreece, Bart., against John William Briant, heir of John Briant, and Mary Briant, William Henry Briant, and Charles Briant, surviving devisees of John Briant, of divers lands, &c. of John Briant.

The first count of the declaration (dated 21st of December 1832) stated that, in the lifetime of Sir T. H. Apreece, to wit, 29th of September 1819, by indenture between Sir T. H. Apreece of the first part, John Robert Jenkins of the second part, and the said John Briant, as surety for J. R. Jenkins, of the third part, the date whereof is a certain &c., to wit, the day and year last aforesaid, Sir T. H. Apreece demised to Jenkins certain messuages and lands for fourteen years from the date, if Sir T. H. Apreece should so long live, at a yearly rent of 590*l.*, payable quarterly, and also at certain further rents for every acre which Jenkins should use

1. B., as surety for J., became party to an indenture whereby A. leased land to J., at a rent payable by J., for a term determinable on A.'s death; and B. and J. covenanted jointly and severally for themselves and their heirs that B. and J., or one of them, or their heirs, executors, &c., should pay the rent reserved, and also a further rent, as liquidated damages, if the land were farmed contrary to the covenants of the lease.

After B.'s death, rents of both kinds became due: Held, that B.'s devisees were not liable, under stat. 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14., to an action of debt for any of the sum due.

2. In the above action, the declaration stated that, during the term, to wit, 1st of August 1833, B. died, and that the rents became due on days named, which appeared by the dates, but were not alleged, to be later than that day. Plea, that B. died before any part of the debt became due, concluding to the Court. On special demurrer to the plea, for not traversing or denying, or confessing and avoiding, and for putting in issue matter of law: Held, that if the declaration did not shew a debt in B.'s lifetime, it was bad; and that, if it did, the plea traversed it; and that the conclusion to the Court, if bad at all, should have been specially objected to by the demurrer.

3. In order to induce the Court to exempt an executor, who has failed in an action brought by him in that character, from costs, under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 31., it is not sufficient that the action has been brought bonâ fide, under counsel's advice, and that it has been defeated on a difficult point of law, unless there be improper conduct on the part of the defendant. Unnecessary prolixity in the pleadings is not such conduct. Nor omitting to give the plaintiff information which might have prevented his proceeding with the action, if the plaintiff did not apply for the information.

in certain ways respectively in the indenture specified, and a further rent for every acre husbanded contrary to the covenants in the indenture afterwards contained; which further rents it was thereby declared and agreed, should be deemed, and taken, and be paid as and for liquidated sums by way of settled damages, and not by way of nomine pœnæ or in terrorem: and J. R. Jenkins and John Briant, for themselves, jointly and severally, and for their several and respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, did covenant, &c., with Sir T. H. Apreece and his assigns, that J. R. Jenkins and John Briant, or some or one of them, or their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, should pay the said rent of 590*l.*, and such further rents as should become due; and also that J. R. Jenkins should farm the land in a husbandlike manner, and should not sow, &c. (as in the indenture particularised). The declaration then stated that afterwards, to wit, 27th of May 1833, Sir T. H. Apreece died, and that, during the term and in the lifetime of Sir T. H. Apreece, to wit, 25th of December 1832, a large sum &c., to wit, 295*l.*, for rent for two quarters, became due and still is unpaid. The declaration then stated different breaches by Jenkins of covenants as to farming, and that further rents thereby became due, amounting on the whole, on 25th of December 1832, to a large sum &c., to wit, &c., which is still unpaid; and the declaration also set forth other breaches of the same kind, by which further rents, amounting, on 25th of December 1832, to large sums, to wit, &c., became due and are still unpaid: averment that, after the making of the indenture and during the continuance of the term, to wit, 1st of August 1823, John Briant died, having by his last will and testament duly executed and attested to pass real estates, and bearing a certain date, to wit, 19th of November 1822, devised certain lands, &c., to the defendants, Mary Briant, William Henry Briant, and Charles Briant, and to one William Back since deceased, which lands and tenements the said John Briant had power so to dispose of.

The second count averred only breaches of the covenants as to cultivation, whereby afterwards, to wit, 29th of September 1832, a large sum of money, to wit, &c., for further rents, became due and is still unpaid.

The four defendants all pleaded separately.

Mary Briant pleaded :

First, that the indenture in the second count is not the deed of John Briant.

Secondly, after setting out on oyer the indenture in the first count, that Sir T. H. Apreece, in his lifetime, and at the time of his death, was not a creditor of John Briant, having a just debt due and owing to him the said Sir T. H. Apreece, upon or by virtue of any bond or other specialty within the meaning of the statute in such case &c. : verification.

Thirdly, as to the first count, that, before any part of the said debt in the said first count mentioned accrued due, as in that count mentioned, and in the lifetime of the said Sir T. H. Apreece, the said John Briant died : verification.

Fourthly, fifthly, sixthly, and seventhly (to the same count), traversing different breaches by Jenkins.

Eighthly, to the same count, that, by the last will and testament of John Briant, he gave, &c. (mentioning several devisees besides the defendants), and that the several devisees are still living and have not renounced, &c.

Ninthly, to the same count, that the defendant had no lands by devise, except certain premises in Essex and Middlesex; that the former had been sold, and the proceeds applied to satisfy a bond debt of the devisor; and that the latter had been taken by the directors of the St. Katharine Docks Company (under stat. 6 G. 4. c. cv., local and personal, public), for a sum assessed by a jury, which had been paid into the Bank to the account of the Accountant-General of the Court of Exchequer, and invested in 3 per cent consols.

Tenthly, to the same count, that, after the making of the indenture, and the death of John Briant, and in the lifetime of Sir T. H. Apreece, by indenture, dated 1st of January 1826, made between Sir T. H. Apreece of the one part, J. R. Jenkins of the second part, and the defendant Mary Briant and W. Back of the third part, the rent mentioned in the indenture of lease was reduced, and the option of determining the term released, and the provisions of the lease in other respects altered.

Eleventhly, to the same count, that, by a certain other indenture, dated 9th of January 1833, between J. R. Jenkins of the first part, Mary Briant of the second part, and Sir T. H. Apreece of the third part, the residue of the term was surrendered to Sir T. H. Apreece.

The defendant William Henry Briant pleaded the twelve following pleas, and the same were also pleaded severally by Charles Briant.

The first eight were the same respectively as the first eight pleaded by Mary Briant.

The ninth was a plea corresponding to the ninth of Mary Briant, mutatis mutandis.

The

The tenth and eleventh pleas were the same as the tenth and eleventh pleas of Mary Briant.

The twelfth plea was a plea of bankruptcy by each defendant.

John William Briant pleaded :

First, like Mary Briant's first plea.

Secondly, after setting out on oyer the indenture in the first count, that he took nothing by descent from the said John Briant.

Thirdly, like Mary Briant's second plea, but without oyer.

Fourthly, like Mary Briant's third plea.

Fifthly, sixthly, seventhly, and eighthly, like Mary Briant's fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh pleas respectively.

Ninthly, like Mary Briant's tenth plea.

Tenthly, like Mary Briant's eleventh plea.

Issue was joined on the first, fourth, fifth; sixth, and seventh pleas of Mary Briant, William Henry Briant, and Charles Briant, on the twelfth plea of William Henry Briant and Charles Briant, and on the first, second, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth pleas of John William Briant.

The plaintiffs demurred to the second, third, eighth, and eleventh pleas of Mary Briant, William Henry Briant, and Charles Briant, and to the third, fourth, and tenth pleas of John William Briant.

On the ninth plea of Mary Briant, William Henry Briant, and Charles Briant, the plaintiffs prayed judgment, &c., to be levied upon the lands, &c., of John Briant, which should or might thereafter come to those defendants respectively, as devisees of the said John Briant, in case judgment should be given against them on their other pleas.

To the tenth pleas of Mary Briant, William Henry Briant, and Charles Briant, and to the ninth plea of John William Briant, the plaintiff replied, that the deed was executed by Sir T. H. Apreece on the 5th of October, 1832, and that no day or month was therein mentioned by way of date, with a special traverse of the deed being executed at the time mentioned in the plea, concluding to the country.

The defendants joined severally in demurrer.

All the demurrers were special. The Court pronounced its judgment only on the demurrer to the third plea of Mary Briant. The causes assigned in that demurrer were, that the said plea was defective, as it did not consist of matter of fact, but of argument and legal inference only; that the plea neither traversed nor denied, nor confessed and avoided, the causes of action; and that it put in issue matter of law; also, that it was no answer to the action.

In Easter term last, Friday, May 1st(a), the demurrers to the second and third pleas of Mary Briant were argued. The Court having confined its judgment to the third plea, the arguments on the second are omitted.

Stephen Serjt. in support of the demurrer.

I. Upon the demurrer to the third plea, the substantial question is, whether, under st. 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14. s. 3., the death of John Briant prevents the plaintiffs from recovering. On this record, it must certainly be taken that he died before any of the breaches occurred. But neither the intent nor the letter of the statute confines the remedy to cases where the debt becomes payable in the lifetime of a covenantor or obligee. It is true that the first three sections speak of creditors; but the whole context shews that the word is used so as to include this case. The evil pointed at in the recital, in the first section, is that persons have "by bonds or other specialties bound themselves and their heirs, and have afterwards died seised in fee simple of and in manors, &c." "or had power or authority to dispose of or charge the same by their wills," and have, "to the defrauding of such their creditors, devised the same, or disposed thereof, in such manner as such creditors have lost their said debts." The creditors here spoken of are, therefore, parties in favour of whom the bond or specialty is made. Sect. 2. makes wills fraudulent and void as against such creditors as aforesaid; and sect. 3. gives to every such creditor an action of debt against the heir and devisees jointly. The creditors here meant are such persons as, by virtue of the bond or instrument, ultimately become creditors. It is not essential to the relation of creditor and debtor that money should be payable during the lives of the parties. Such a relation may exist before anything be actually payable, as in the case of a debitum in præsenti solvendum in futuro. The policy of the statute is to prevent owners of lands from placing their land out of the reach of the liability arising upon their own deeds; which, within both the statute and the moral sense, is a fraud. [Littledale J. An executor may pay simple contract debts, though his testator be under a covenant, if the covenant has not been broken.] For the purpose of the present argument, it is sufficient that he cannot do so if he have notice notice of a breach of covenant subsequent to the testator's death. That shews that such a breach creates a debt from the testator. In Wilson v. Knubley (a) it was held that covenant would not lie against a devisee for breaches in the testator's lifetime, the statute mentioning only debt. That was an instance of the mischief arising from a narrow interpretation of the statute; and it led to the enacting of stat. 11 G. 4. and 1 W. 4. c. 47. s. 3. (b), which gave the action of covenant also.

The new act may be taken as a legislative declaration of the intent of the former act, so far as the form of action is not concerned; and here the form of action is not concerned, for debt is unquestionably a proper form of action on this specialty. Now, in sect. 2. of the new act, the legislature, in declaring against what parties the will is to be fraudulent and void, does not (as in the earlier act) use the word creditor, but only mentions such persons with whom the deviser "shall have entered into any bond, covenant, or other specialty binding his, her, or their heirs." Then sect. 3. enacts, that "such creditor" shall have his action of debt and covenant. Thus, in the later act, creditors are generally persons with whom the specialty is entered into: that must therefore be the meaning of the term in the earlier act, since the later act was not meant to introduce any change as to the parties benefited. "Creditor" is used in the same sense as covenantee or obligee. If the meaning were so confined as must be contended on the other side, it would have been easy, in the earlier act, to say, "where any person shall die, owing such money."

(b) Which (sect. 1.) is not applicable to the case of persons dying before the passing of the act, 16th July 1830.

One test of the applicability of stat. 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14. is, whether the heir could be sued alone at common law; for the intention was to extend the previous liability of the heir to the devisee. Now in 14 Vin. Abr. 238, Heir (A.) pl. 1., it is said, "If A. grant for him and his heirs to B. for years, or, &c. an annuity to have to him after the death of A. the grantor, though A. himself could never be charged upon this grant, inasmuch as it is to be paid after his death, yet, inasmuch as he binds himself and his heirs, his heir shall be charged if he has assets, as well as where a man binds himself and his heirs by obligation to pay money after his death." That goes much beyond the present case; for there the obligee could in no event have been liable in his lifetime. In Plasket v. Beeby (a) it was contended that an infant devisee might pray that the parol might demur, on the ground that the intent of the statute was to place the heir and devisee on the same footing; but the Court held that the privilege of the heir was peculiar, originating in the situation in which the feudal law of tenure placed him, with regard to his land, during his infancy. But the liability to the specialty debts of the ancestor does not rest upon any feudal privilege: that case, therefore, affords no ground for distinguishing, in the present question, between the heir and the devisee.

Another test is, whether the executor could retain, if he were himself the covenantee; for that would depend upon his claim constituting, or not, a debt from the testator. Now he could so retain; Plumer v. Marchant (b). There the testator had covenanted that he by will, or his executors or administrators within six months after his death, should pay to the defendant 700*l*. The defendant, having become administrator to the covenantor, claimed to retain the 700*l*. In the argument against the claim, it was urged that it was not "a debt in the testator;" but the Court allowed the claim.

In Ex parte Tindal (a) a party covenanted to cause to be paid 4000*l*., within twelve months after his decease, to his wife's trustees, the annual produce to go to her for life, in case she survived him. The covenantor having afterwards become bankrupt in his wife's lifetime, the wife's trustees claimed to prove under stat. 6 G. 4. c. 16. s. 56.; and one question, as stated by Tindal C. J. in delivering judgment, was, whether the bankrupt had, before the commission issued, "contracted any debt payable upon a contingency" which had not happened before the issuing of the commission; and it was held by Lord Brougham C., Tindal C. J., and Littledale J., that the demand was proveable. There the husband himself could not have been called on to pay in his lifetime; and there was no reason for holding that he had contracted a debt, which would not be good in the present case. In Westfaling v. Westfaling (b) Lord Hardwicke expressed himself against giving a limited construction to the statute, as being made for preventing fraud. It has often been said that early statutes are more loosely worded, and should receive a more liberal construction, than modern ones (c). A strong instance

II. The third plea is defective in form. From Bisser v. Bisser (a) it appears that, where the time is material, it is sufficiently alleged, though it be laid only under a videlicet, upon general demurrer. Therefore the plea, if it deny the time of the death, should have been in the form of a traverse, and have concluded to the country, Com. Dig. Pleader, (E. 32.), (G. 2.); Bac. Abr. Pleas and Pleadings, (H. 3.) (b); note (3) to Hayman v. Gerrard (c); since the plaintiff, in reply, could only repeat the allegation in the declaration. The plea is in fact a constructive denial of the allegation in the declaration. [Patteson J. It treats the declaration as ambiguous, and makes it certain.] That cannot be done. The defendant should have demurred for ambiguity, or else he should have denied or confessed. If the plea admit the time of the death, it is a mere allegation of a matter of law.

R. V. Richards, contra.

I. Sect. 1. of stat. 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14. shews that the intention was to prevent debtors from defrauding their creditors; and so the next two sections are to be understood. Then was John Briant a fraudulent debtor? Was he ever liable to be sued on this specialty? If not, he was not a debtor, nor were the covenantees his creditors. No time can be pointed out at which he was so liable. This was not a debitum in presenti solvendum in futuro: the money was not, during his life, payable at all events: there might have been no breach of covenant, or an eviction, or a determination of the lease by the death of Sir T. H. Apreece. Then, again, the reddendum is by Jenkins alone, though some of the covenants are by Jenkins and Briant. The only safe method of interpreting the act is to adhere to the words. The analogy between heir and devisee does not exist, as appears from Plasket v. Beeby (a). The heir's liability is by common law; that of the devisee by the statute only. The remarks of the judges in Wilson v. Knubley (b), though the decision certainly was upon the form of action, shew that the statute is not to be extended beyond its terms, which point only to actual debts existing in the devisor's time. In Welsh v. Welsh (c) the plaintiff was surety for the defendant in an annuity deed: afterwards the defendant became bankrupt and obtained his certificate; and the plaintiff, having subsequently been compelled to pay arrears due after the commission, sued the defendant, who relied upon stat. 49 G. 3. c. 121. ss. 8 and 17: but Lord Ellenborough said that it was not a debt, quoad the surety, until he was in a condition to be damnified by it. That principle was adhered to in Flanagan v. Watkins (d), which was affirmed in error, Watkins v. Flanagan (e). These decisions led to the enactments in stat. 6 G. 4. c. 16. ss. 54, 55. In McDougal v. Paton (g) the plaintiff, being surety for the defendant's payment of certain rents, had been compelled to pay arrears accruing after a commission of bankrupt had issued against the defendant, who had obtained his certificate: and it was held that the plaintiff's claim was not met by stat. 49 G. 3.

c. 121. s. 8.: and Dallas C. J. during the argument, said, "Is it possible that this rent, which was not due till after the bankruptcy, can be considered as a debt due at the time of issuing the commission?" So, in Alsop v. Price (a), it was held that a surety in a bond, which had not been forfeited till after the bankruptcy of the principal, was not barred by stat. 7 G. 1. st. 1. c. 31. s. 1. from recovering against the principal, after his certificate, for money paid upon the forfeiture of the bond; and Lord Mansfield said, "It was not a debt to be paid by him in futuro, at all events, but depended on the acts of the principal, viz. whether he did or did not comply with the stipulations in the condition of the bond." This was afterwards met by stat. 49 G. 3. c. 121. s. 8. Ex parte Adney (b) and Goddard v. Vanderheyden (c) are to the same effect. These decisions shew how far the present case differs from that of a bond conditioned for future payments absolutely, where there is a debitum in præsenti solvendum in futuro. [Littledale J. Suppose a bond for the payment of rents. Coleridge J. An obligee acknowledges himself indebted. The statute is to prevent fraudulent devises; but how can there be a fraud in not providing against a claim of which the devisor does not know the existence? In the case of a bond for a penal rent, which never can become due, the argument for the plaintiff would draw the whole within this act.] And it would make John Briant, at the moment of the execution of the deed, a debtor for every breach which could accrue afterwards.

II. The plaintiff is bound to bring the case within the act by his declaration. If the substantial objection be good, and the declaration shew that the breaches were subsequent to the death of John Briant, the declaration is bad : if this do not appear by the declaration, then the plea introduces new matter.

Stephen Serjt. in reply.

First. The fact of the damage being contingent does not make the devise the less fraudulent; the devisor, knowing his contingent liability, ought to have charged the lands in the event of the damage accruing. [Coleridge J. You are assuming that he knew that the liability of the land continued after his death.] It might equally well be said that the legislature, at the time when stat. 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14. passed, assumed that a devisor, antecedently to the act, knew that his lands were liable; for the devising them away is treated as defrauding the creditors, in sect. 1. [Coleridge J. Would the creditors be bound to proceed against the specific fund created by such a charge as you suggest?] The decisions on bankruptcy questions, which have been cited on the other side, are inapplicable. The surety, in proving, had to swear that the bankrupt was indebted at the time of the bankruptcy; and the question was, whether, in the particular case, he could so swear. But here the question is whether a posthumous liability is not within the statute.

Secondly. The third plea does not deny the declaration, for it is not opposed to it: and it does not confess, for it is inconsistent with it.

The Court stated that they would say, on the Friday following, whether they thought it necessary to hear arguments on the other points raised by the record.

On

On Friday, May 8th, the Court having intimated their intention to consider the question already argued, before any others, Stephen Serjt. (a) suggested that the demurrers on the other pleas must be argued and decided, inasmuch as the officer, in taxing the costs, ought to know for whom each issue was found. [Patteson J. If one issue of fact decide the whole question, the practice at nisi prius is to discharge the jury as to the rest.] Since the rule of Hil. 2 W. 4. I. 74 (b), it seems to be necessary that every issue should be determined. [Coleridge J. A point something like this was discussed in two late cases upon awards; one in the Common Pleas (c), the other in the Exchequer (d).]

the lessee, had joined in the covenants of a lease for years granted by Sir T. H. Apreece to one Jenkins, determinable on the death of Sir T. H. Apreece. By the lease, a yearly rent of 590*l.* was reserved, and several penal rents, to a large amount, to arise conditionally on the cultivation of the land in particular specified modes. Breaches were assigned in respect of both classes. Several pleas were pleaded; but we were only called upon to consider the second and third; and it is only necessary for us now to consider the latter. That plea stated that, before any part of the debt in the declaration mentioned accrued due, and in the life time of Sir T. H. Apreece, John Briant died, concluding with a verification. This plea was specially demurred to; and it was objected, in argument against it, that it contained only an indirect and argumentative denial of the facts alleged in the declaration, that it put in issue a matter of law, and was improperly concluded with an averment. But the substantial question between the parties was, whether the case, as it appeared on the record, was within the statute on which the action was brought.

Upon this point, it was contended for the plaintiffs that, although it were to be taken that no breach of covenant had occurred in the lifetime of the testator, still upon that liberal interpretation of the statute, which the Court ought to make, the testator must be considered as debtor in his lifetime to the covenantee. That the words of the preamble applied, not merely to persons owing money in their lifetime, but to those who had "by bonds or other specialties bound themselves and their heirs;" and that the relation of debtor and creditor might exist, although no money were actually payable at the time, and although even it might be contingent whether any would ever become payable. In support of this argument analogies were relied on, from the liabilities of executors, and the bankrupt laws.

The decisions upon this statute are not numerous; and there is none directly applicable to the present case. Neither do they lay down any other rule of construing it than we should be bound to follow on general principles, that, namely, of ascertaining the mischief intended to be remedied, and advancing the remedy so far as the words of the enacting part will, in a fair interpretation, and without any straining, enable us to go.

The mischief described in the preamble is, that, by the practice or contrivance of debtors, creditors were defrauded of their just debts; that it often happened that persons, who had bound themselves by bonds or other specialties, by their last wills devised their lands, or disposed thereof in such manner that such creditors had lost their debts. "For remedying of which, and for the maintenance of just and upright dealing," the statute first avoids all wills, &c., of such lands, as against such creditors, and next, in order to enable "such creditors" "to recover their said debts," enacts, by the third section, that, in the cases before mentioned, every such creditor may have and maintain his action of debt, upon his bond or specialty, against the heir at law of such obligor, and such devisee, jointly.

It is at least clear, upon these words, that, in order to bring a case within the statute, the relation of creditor and debtor, in whatever sense we understand those words, must exist between the plaintiff and the devisor in the lifetime of both. In the present case, John Briant had become liable for the performance of covenants by another man; no payment would be due from him; he would not be indebted, either in ordinary parlance, or in ordinary legal language, until there was a breach by his principal. No such event happened in his lifetime. Some other meaning, therefore, than that which ordinarily attaches to the words creditor and debtor must be resorted to, in order to support this action; and, accordingly, it is said that, to advance the remedy given by the act, we ought to hold that a man becomes indebted the moment he has made himself contingently liable for the breach of any covenant, as from that moment it becomes a legal fraud in him so to dispose of his lands by will as to prevent the covenantee from having recourse to them, and as from that moment the land becomes indebted.

The latter of these reasons appears to be an argument in a circle; for the land is not indebted, or bound to the discharge of the future demand, in such a sense as to prevent its alienation by devise, unless the owner was indebted in his lifetime within the meaning of the statute: this latter proposition therefore cannot be proved by the former

With respect to the argument, that a devise under the supposed circumstances is a legal fraud, in order to be satisfied of that, it is not enough that we should think that the remedy would have been more complete, if it had been extended by apt words to such a case; but we ought to have almost irresistible evidence of the intention of the legislature to control the general power of disposition by devise to this extent before we should be warranted in affixing to the language used any other meaning than it would bear in ordinary parlance or common technical acceptance. Upon this point some information may be derived from the case of Wilson v. Knubley (a). This Court there thought it safe to collect that intention of the legislature, to which alone effect could be given, from the language of the enacting part of the statute; they thought, therefore, that it pointed to a distinction between debts, strictly so called, and damages arising from the breach of covenants. Grose J. says that "A mere breach of covenant cannot be considered as a debt." Lawrence J. says, "All through it speaks of debts, which must mean existing debts," and observes that the damages there sought to be recovered "never could be considered as a debt due from the testator at the time of his death within the meaning of the act." Le Blanc J. says, the legislature "only contemplated what were debts strictly so called, and did not mean to extend the remedy against devisees to the recovery of damages for breaches of covenants or contracts made by their testators." That case, therefore, which determined that an action of covenant could not be brought upon this statute against the devisee, proceeded as much upon the presumed intention as the mere letter. In the present case, the damages for the breaches of covenant declared on are liquidated, and therefore, in form, may be sued for in an action of debt: but they are not the less in substance damages. Nor, in the present case, is it to be forgotten that the testator was a surety, whose eventual liability was contingent only on the future default of his principal. The substance of the testator's contract was, to secure to the lessor the performance of the covenants by the lessee.

It was said, however, that, whenever a testator is bound by a personal covenant, the executor may be sued, and that, as he is only answerable for the debts of his testator, this implies that the testator's liability, on his covenant constitutes a debt existing in him in his lifetime. In support of this was cited the case of Plumer, v. Marchant (a), in which it was held that the trustee of a marriage settlement, containing a covenant by P. M. that he should, by his last will, or that his executors, &c. should within six months after his death, pay 700*l.* to the trustee on certain trusts, might, after P. M.'s death, and becoming his administrator, retain the sum of 700*l.*, and give such retainer in evidence under the plea of plene administravit to an action of debt on the intestate's bond. The reason of this decision is clear. If the trustee had not also been administrator, he might have sued the person filling that character on this covenant; it followed therefore that, filling both characters himself, he had a right to retain the amount; the retainer was an actual payment of it, and an administration pro tanto of the assets: but this decides nothing applicable to the present question. The executor is the general representative of the testator as to his personal contracts, whether the breach accrued in the lifetime of the testator, or after his death; whether after breach the sum due be called a debt, or the penalty of a broken covenant, are indifferent matters. In the case cited, the instant P. M. had died intestate, the 700*l.* was a liquidated debt, due from the representative to the trustee, the payment of which indeed might, in case of the estate, be delayed for six months, but which the representative would have been justified in paying,

paying, and therefore was justified in retaining, instanter. In the principal case, the liability of the devisee is created wholly by statute, and is not founded on the same principle, nor can be carried to the same extent, as that of the executor. Another case was cited of Ex parte Tindal(a) in which it was held that, to covenant that a sum of money should be paid to trustees within twelve months after the party's decease, on certain contingencies, was to contract a debt payable on a contingency within the meaning of the 6 G. 4. c. 16. s. 56., for the valuing and proving of contingent liabilities under the bankrupt laws. This also appears to us wholly inapplicable to the present case. Under this section, the issuing of the commission is the analogous point to death under the statute of W. & M.; and both the letter and spirit of the section point to a liability which, at the date of the commission, not only has not yet become ripe, so that an action can be maintained on it then, but to one which rests in uncertainty whether it may ever attach at all. Such a future and contingent liability the legislature has brought within the range of the bankrupt law, and in so doing has called a debt. But for the statute it is obvious that the covenantor in the case cited could not have been considered a debtor to the covenantee, for not only no action of debt, but no action at all, could ever have been maintained against him. And, as regards the parties themselves, the law would remain the same after the statute. Though the statute calls it a debt, none of the legal incidents to the relation of creditor and debtor exist as between the parties. The decision therefore of the case cannot be extended to help the present argument for the plaintiffs; it is merely the construction of those words, taken with their context, and with reference, as well to the manifest intention of the section itself, as the general policy of the bankrupt law.

The plaintiffs' counsel, therefore, has failed to satisfy us that we ought to construe the words of this statute in any other than their ordinary meaning: and we think that the remedy given by it applies only where a debt in that sense exists between the parties in the lifetime of both.

With respect to the pleas, it is enough to say that, if the declaration be taken as affirmatively alleging that any part of the debt mentioned in the declaration accrued due in the life time of Briant, the third plea appears to us to traverse that allegation with sufficient directness; on the other hand, if the declaration does not do that, it is substantially defective, and it becomes unnecessary for the defendants to have recourse to any plea. As to the objection that the third plea is improperly concluded with a verification, that, if available at all, ought to have been specially assigned; and, it not having been so assigned, the plaintiffs cannot now avail themselves of it.

We think, therefore, there must be judgment for the defendants on the third plea (a).

A rule having been accordingly taken out for judgment for the defendants, on the third plea of Mary Briant, William Henry Briant, and Charles Briant, and on the fourth plea of John William Briant,

(a) The plaintiff was advised to enter a nolle prosequi on the second count, the principle of the decision appearing to go to the whole declaration.

Stephen

Stephen Serjt., in Michaelmas term 1835, obtained a rule to shew cause why the plaintiffs should not be exempted from payment of costs. The affidavits in support of the rule stated that, at the commencement of the action, Jenkins was indebted to the executors in the sum of 250*l.* for rent, and that the injury done by him by breaches of covenant for good husbandry amounted to 710*l.*, independent of the further rents thereby incurred by way of stipulated damage: that the plaintiffs had endeavoured to obtain the amount from Jenkins; that he had absconded, and that they believed him to be insolvent; that they had ascertained that John Briant's personal estate was exhausted; and that they had been informed and believed that his real estate was large, and were unacquainted with the incumbrances on it: that they had ascertained that a suit was pending in the Court of Chancery for the purpose of having the trusts of John Briant's will carried into effect, and the incumbrances on his real estates ascertained, in which a decree had been made, referring to a Master of that Court to take an account of such incumbrances; and that the plaintiffs were advised by counsel that, until they had established their debt in a Court of law, they would not be entitled to prove it in the Master's office: that they had afterwards brought the action, under the advice of a gentleman of the common law bar, who advised that the point of the liability of the defendants was one in which the plaintiffs were likely to succeed, or, at any rate, one upon which it was their duty to take the opinion of a Court of law: that all the defendants appeared by the same attorney: and that the pleadings and the results were as has been above stated. It was further deposed that the pleas of Mary Briant, Briant, William; Henry Briant, and Charles Briant, contained 289, and those of John William Briant 165, common law folios; and that the plaintiffs' attorney had requested the defendants' attorney to consent to a consolidation rule, which the latter had refused to do.

The affidavits in answer stated that Mary Briant was not, at present nor at the commencement of the action, in the enjoyment of any benefit under the will: that William Henry Briant and Charles Briant took no beneficial interest other than a reversionary interest expectant on a contingency which had not yet occurred, of which interest they had been divested by their bankruptcies: and that John William Briant took nothing by descent: that the practice of the Court of Chancery did not make an action at law a necessary preliminary step to claiming before the Master: that the defences had been severed at the recommendation of a special pleader: that the attorneys of the parties had repeatedly attended Patteson J., who had made orders permitting the defendants to plead the several pleas (and four others, which however had not been pleaded), and had allowed them to plead separately, after his attention had been especially called to the objection: that the defendants' attorney had declined agreeing to the consolidation, in order that, if judgment should be given against any of the pleas of one defendant on technical grounds, the pleas of the other defendants might be amended; that he had offered that, until the case of Mary Briant was decided, the other cases should stand over; but that the plaintiffs' attorney had made up all four demurrer books, and had set all the cases down for argument.

Maule

Maulé showed cause in the same term (a). The meaning of the legislature in stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 48 s. 31, was to put an end to the inconvenience arising from the rule that executors were not liable to costs like other plaintiffs. They are by that section subjected to the common liability, the Court, or a judge, having however the power in extraordinary cases to exempt them from it. In Lysons v. Barrow (b) the Court of Common Pleas exempted an executor from costs, on the ground that it was his duty to attempt to recover the money. That decision cannot be supported; for, according to Dowbiggin v. Harrison (c) and Jobson v. Forster (d), the executor was not suing in a representative character, and therefore the statute was inapplicable. And, supposing Lysons v. Barrow (b) to have been a case under the statute, the decision is inconsistent with a later case in the Common Pleas, Southgate v. Crowley (e), where that Court held that the circumstance of an executor having brought an action properly is not an answer to the defendant's claim for costs under the statute, and that the onus of shewing the exception is upon the executor, the general rule being that, if unsuccessful, he is liable to costs. Southgate v. Crowley (e) has been confirmed, in the Common Pleas, by Engler v. Twisden (g). The exemption of executors, before the late statute, arose from the notion (first supported in Haycarth v. David (a), in 7 Jac. 1., and scarcely justified by the language of the legislature) that stat. 4 Jac. 1. c. 3. s. 2. did not extend to executors. It was not supposed that executors had any claim to the exemption upon general principles of justice. The only question now is whether, in any particular case, the defendant has so acted as to deprive himself of his ordinary right to costs. Here several parties are sued; and it appears from the pleas that the defences are different. Every plea discloses a defence on the merits; and the learned judge before whom the matter was discussed thought them all proper. The proposal to consolidate was inadmissible. [Stephen Serjt. here intimated that he did not rely upon the refusal to consolidate.] The action itself is vexatious.

Stephen Serjt. contra. It appears that the plaintiffs were advised that this action was necessary, unless they chose to forfeit their claim to have the demand taken into the account of incumbrances by the Master in Chancery. They were advised by counsel, that the legal claim existed, or at any rate ought to be insisted upon with a view to obtain the opinion of the Court upon it; and therefore they could not abandon it consistently with their duty. The question has been decided against them upon an abstruse point of law, which appeared to this Court to require time for deliberation; and the action cannot, therefore, be said to have been commenced vexatiously or on frivolous grounds.

(a) Cro. Jac. 229. And see Barret v. Winchcomb, 12 Ja. 1., Cro. Jac. 361.

This

This is the first case, since the statute, in which executors have failed on a question of law. In Southgate v. Crowley (a) the Court certainly laid down the rule more strictly than before against executors; but one of the learned judges dissented. Engler v. Twisden (b) turned upon want of caution on the part of the executor. It may, however, be conceded that mere bona fides in the executor is not sufficient to exempt him from costs; but the present case shews more. Then, as to the conduct of the defendants, the information as to the want of assets by devise was withheld. And the severing of the defences was carried to an extent that created unnecessary expense; for, though some of the defences were applicable to some of the defendants only, and not to the rest, yet, as to the majority of the pleas, it was otherwise, and no severance was required.

Cur. adv. vult.

In the following Hilary term (c), Lord Denman C. J. delivered the judgment of the Court.

This is an action by executors against an heir and devisees upon stat. 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14.; and the present application is, that the plaintiffs may be exempted from payment of costs, under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 31.

This latter statute points to making executors, who are plaintiffs, generally liable to costs, in the same way as parties who sue in their own right. That is the general rule; and it is founded on the natural justice of indemnifying successful defendants from an action wrongfully brought against them. The privilege which executors have hitherto enjoyed was not founded on natural justice, but upon their not being named in st. 4 J. 1. c. 3. s. 2.

The stat. 8 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. ingrafts on the general rule the exception, "unless the Court in which such action is brought, or a Judge of any of the said superior Courts, shall otherwise order." That being the exception, a party applying for the benefit of it must make out special grounds for the interference of the Court.

The plaintiffs believed that there were large assets by devise, and that it was necessary to establish their debt at law before it could be taken into the account by the Master in Chancery. They were advised by counsel that they ought to bring the action at law. Also, they impute to the defendants, first, that they have introduced an unnecessary prolixity on the record, and, secondly, that they were aware of facts, which, if communicated to the plaintiffs, would have prevented them from proceeding with the action.

These imputations we dismiss from our consideration: the first, because the question is not affected by the conduct of the defendants after the commencement of the suit; the second, because no previous inquiry on the part of the plaintiffs has been shewn; and it was their business to seek information, not that of the defendants to volunteer it.

It comes then to this only, that the action was brought bonâ fide and under legal advice; and, we may add, that it was always an action of very doubtful result: but we think these not sufficient grounds for depriving the defendants of their costs, they having been guilty guilty of no concealment or improper conduct. There is no ground for relieving the estate of the plaintiffs' testator, supposing that there are assets, nor the plaintiffs themselves, supposing that there are none, from the payment. The plaintiffs, if they had abstained from bringing the action, would not, in so doing, have been guilty of a devastavit.

There are three cases on this point; Wilkinson v. Edwards (a), Southgate v. Crowley (b), and Engler v. Twisden (c). We concur in these decisions (d); and we are of opinion that this rule must be discharged.

TRINITY VACATION.
IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.
(Error from the King's Bench.)

*Thursday,
June 18th.*

BESWICK against JAMES SWINDELLS.

By the condition of a bond for payment of 400*l.* it was recited, that the obligor was about to marry E. E., linen draper, and thereby to become possessed of a stock in trade, now here, and that in consideration thereof it was agreed that he should execute a bond to the obligee to pay to the children of E. E. by her late husband 300*l.*, within twelve months next after E. E.'s death, in the event there-inafter specified: and the condition, therefore, was, That if S. (the obligor) shall within twelve months next after the decease of E. E., pay to her child or children, &c. 300*l.*, "if upon an account of the stock in trade and effects in the linen-drapery business, if then carried on by the said S.," the same "shall amount to the sum of 400*l.*, but in case, upon such account to be taken as aforesaid, the said stock in trade and effects shall amount to less than that sum, then if the said S." shall pay to the child or children, &c. 120*l.* within twelve months next after the decease of E. E., the said obligation shall be void, &c. Plea, that E. E. died, and that, before her death, and ever since, S. had ceased to carry on the business, and that he had not, at or since the time of her death, any stock in trade, &c. Replication, that at the end of twelve months from E. E.'s decease, there were, and still are, children of E. E. by her late husband living:

Held, on demurrer, that, as the recited agreement was to pay in the event after specified, and the condition was to pay 300*l.* or 120*l.* according to an account to be taken of the business, if then carried on, the obligor might discharge himself by pleading that he had discontinued the business.

DEBT on a bond for 400*l.*, given by the defendant to the plaintiff and another, since deceased, with a condition (which was set out on oyer) as follows:—
"Whereas a marriage is intended to be shortly had and solemnised between the above bounden James Swindells and Elizabeth Etchells of Stockport aforesaid, linen-draper, by which event he the said James Swindells will become possessed of a considerable stock in trade, goods, chattels, and effects, now the property and in the possession of the said Elizabeth Etchells; and it was agreed upon the treaty for the said marriage, and in consideration of the emolument which the said James Swindells would acquire by such marriage, that he, the said James Swindells, should execute and give a sufficient bond unto the said Joel Beswick and John Swindells, to pay unto the children of the said Elizabeth Etchells by her late husband Edward Etchells deceased, or the survivors or survivor of them, and the issue of such of them as shall happen to be dead leaving lawful issue, the sum of 300*l.*, to be equally divided between and amongst them, if more than one, share and share alike, and, if but one, to such only child in manner herein-after mentioned, within the space of twelve months next after the decease of the said Elizabeth Etchells, in the event hereinafter specified: now, therefore, the condition of the before written obligation is such that, if the above bounden James Swindells, his heirs, executors, or administrators, do and shall, within the space of twelve months next after the decease of the said Elizabeth Etchells his intended wife, well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the child or children of the said Elizabeth Etchells by the said Edward Etchells deceased, which shall be then living, or the issue of such of them as shall be then dead leaving lawful issue (such issue taking only the part or share his, her, or their deceased parents or parent would have been entitled unto if living), the full and just sum of 300*l.* of lawful money of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland current in England, unto and equally between them, in the proportions aforesaid if more than one, and, if but one child, then the whole to such surviving child, if, upon an account of the stock in trade and effects in the linen-drapery, haberdashery, or mercery trade, or business, if then carried on by the said James Swindells, (a) shall amount to the sum of 400*l.*; but, in case upon

Plea, that, after the said marriage and before the commencement of this suit, viz., 26th of December 1831, the said Elizabeth died, and that, long before her death, viz., 1st of November 1830, "he the defendant retired from and ceased, and from thence hitherto has ceased, to carry on the trades and businesses of a linen-draper, haberdasher, and mercer, or any of the said trades and businesses, or any other trade or business whatever, and that, at the time of the death of the said Elizabeth his wife, he had not, nor has he at any time since hitherto had, nor had he at the time of the commencement of this suit, or since, nor has he now, any stock in trade or effects in the linen-drapery, haberdashery, and mercery trades and businesses, or in any of them, or in any other trade or business whatever, and that no account of the said stock in trade and effects in the said condition mentioned was or could be taken at the time of the death of the said wife of the said defendant, or at any other time from thence hitherto." Demurrer, stating for causes, that the plea alleges matter which is a complete answer to the declaration and defence to the action, and independent of the fact of the said Elizabeth having any children by Edward Etchells, and yet the plaintiff has not traversed the same or any part thereof by his replication; and also that the writing obligatory, set out on oyer, was subject to a condition, breaches whereof ought to have been assigned or suggested by the replication, according to the statute, yet no breach is assigned, &c.; and that an issue joined on the said replication would be immaterial; and that the replication is in other respects &c. Joinder in demurrer.

On argument of the demurrer, in Hilary term 1834, the Court of King's Bench gave judgment for the defendant (a). BRAWICK
SWINDELLS.

Sir W. W. Follett for the plaintiff. The defendant married a widow, carrying on trade and having children; and he thereby acquired property which, but for the marriage, would have gone to the children. In consideration of this he agreed to execute, and did execute, a bond, as stated in the pleadings. The condition of that bond was, in effect, that he, in consideration of receiving the property of Etchells, the deceased husband, should provide for Etchells's children by his wife. The carrying on of the business has nothing to do with the engagement. The defendant bound himself to pay the wife's family 300*l.* at her death; with this benefit, however, reserved to him: "If, on an account taken of the stock in trade of the business, if then carried on, the same shall be worth 400*l.*, the obligor shall pay 300*l.*; but if, upon such account to be taken as aforesaid, the stock in trade shall amount to less than 300*l.*, he shall pay only 120*l.*" It was not meant that the bond should be void if he ceased to carry on the business. The proviso was for his benefit: if he ceased to carry on the business, he lost that benefit, and the bond became single. The condition could no longer be fulfilled; there was a failure of the contingency upon which the proviso turned. If the act of God, or that of the obligee, had caused such failure, the obligor would have been discharged; but, as the obligor's own act occasioned it, he is liable. Suppose A. is bound to B. in a bond, with a condition that, if A. goes to York, provided he rides his horse P., the obligation shall be void. If A. chooses to sell the horse, and therefore cannot ride him to York, is he discharged from the obligation? This is not like a covenant on condition. The obligation depends pendes wholly on the obligatory part of the bond; the condition is introduced subsequently for the obligor's advantage. The authorities on this subject are collected in Sheppard's Touchstone, ch. 21., and it is said there (a), "If the condition be that the obligor shall ride with I. S. to Dover such a day, and I. S. doth not go thither that day; in this case, it seems, the condition is broken, and that he must procure I. S. to go thither and ride with him at his peril." Both parts of the condition there are put in the light of acts to be done by the obligor; if I. S. do not go, the bond is single. Here, it was the defendant's own fault that he did not continue the trade. [Lord Abinger C. B. Is that quite certain?] The pleadings do not shew any excuse; if there was one, the defendant ought to have shewn it. [Parke B. As to the instance from Sheppard; the condition, to be like this, should have been, "if the obligor shall ride with I. S. to Dover, if I. S. go there." You compare it to an undertaking by the obligor, that I. S. shall go there.] The obligor in the first instance acknowledges himself indebted. He is bound unless he gets rid of the obligation. A condition is stated, by means of which that is to be done. If the condition be, that he shall go with I. S. to Dover if he will go, and I. S. will not go, the bond is single. The condition is subsequent to the legal obligation; if the condition be not fulfilled, the obligation remains. In Bro. Abr. Conditions, pl. 127., four ways are pointed out in which performance may become impossible; viz., by the act of God; by the act of a stranger; by the act of the obligor; and by that of the obligee. In the first and last cases only, no forfeiture ensues: and the present is not one of those.

The Court of King's Bench has considered this as the case of an agreement, not keeping in view the nature of the instrument in question. In the case of an agreement, the performance of which depends on something to be done previously, the performance of that must be proved by the plaintiff: in the case of an obligation, with a condition added as here, the defendant has to prove that the condition is satisfied, or non-performance excused, and that the obligation, therefore, is discharged. In Com. Dig. Condition (L. 7.), (M. 3.), it is shewn that the non-performance of a condition shall be excused by the default of him who ought to do the first act; the instances given there, and in 5 Bac. Abr. Obligations, (F), clearly mark the distinction between the present case and that of an action upon an agreement. Looking to the intention of the parties, it cannot have been meant that the defendant, executing this bond, should take the whole property, and should be at liberty the next day to leave off trade for the purpose of making it his own. [Lord Abinger C. B. It might be argued on the other side, that he cannot have meant to bind himself to carry on the business under all possible circumstances. Probably there was an intermediate meaning; that he should not carry it on under such circumstances, that the interests of the widow, together with his own, should have been affected.] The parties do not, in fact, appear to have contemplated his abandoning the business. But the defendant has to shew that his doing so renders the obligation void. If the meaning is doubtful, the defendant must suffer by the ambiguity, not the plaintiff as in an action of assumpsit. "When the condition of an obligation is so insensible and incertain, that the meaning cannot be known, there the condition only is void, and the obligation good." Shepp. Touchst. c. 21. (a). The defendant is to shew the meaning of that which he relies upon to discharge him. [Lord Abinger C. B. Suppose the bond were to pay a certain sum, with condition, that if the obligor paid 500*l.* on a ship arriving, the bond should be void; and the ship did not arrive: what do you say the consequence would be?] If the condition depended on the ship arriving within some limited time, the case would be parallel to this: and then the question would be, what caused the non-arrival. Unless that were occasioned by the act of God, or of the obligee, the bond would be in force. Here it is as if the obligor had written to the captain not to come. The case which might be put, of the act becoming illegal, forms a different head of excuse, and need not be considered.

Wightman contra. As to the intention of the parties. The bond seems to have been intended to secure to the children the probable advantage they would have derived if the mother had remained a widow and carried on the business till the time of her death. Had she not married the obligor, she might have continued the business or abandoned it, as she thought proper: the children could not have interfered; though, at her death, if she had still been carrying it on, they would have had the benefit of it. But, after that marriage, if she died and the business still went on, the husband, not the children, would be entitled to the benefits. The intention then was, by this deed, to place them, after her death, in a situation resembling that in which they would have stood if she had not married again; and the defendant's situation, under the deed, was the same, as to continuing the business, as hers would have been if she had remained a widow. If the trade was going on twelve months after her death, the stock was to be valued, and a payment made to them according to the valuation. [Alderson B. You are to be discharged on performance of a condition: what do you say the condition is?] The obligor was to pay on two events happening, that is, if the wife died, and if, at the time mentioned; the business was still carried on. [Lord Abinger C. B. Two events must concur to give you the benefit of the condition.] The plaintiff must contend that the defendant, in order to discharge himself, must at any rate carry on the business. Suppose the condition had been that he should pay a sum of money on the arrival of a ship having gold dust on board; then, as it is argued, he would be liable if the ship did not arrive with gold dust. [Lord Abinger C. B. Yes. Parke B. He has to relieve himself from the obligation.] The obligation is, in effect, a penalty fixed, to secure payment of a sum if certain events shall happen. Their not happening does not render the bond single, because at the time of executing the bond they were possible; they might have happened, although they have not happened. A bond becomes single when the event conditioned for becomes impossible : here it continued to be possible during all the time contemplated. [Alderson B. There is a fallacy in your argument. You say that a bond is given, but the sum is not to be paid unless certain events happen ; but is not the effect of the deed, that the obligor shall not be excused from paying except on certain events? Lord Abinger C. B. If this had been a mere agreement, that in case the business were carried on at a certain time the party would pay in proportion to the value of the stock in trade, it would be admitted, according to the argument on the other side, that, if the business were not carried on at the specified time, the plaintiff must prove fraud in discontinuing it, in order to recover. But the question here is, whether the defendant has not bound himself at all events, and although there be no fraud, if the business be discontinued.] In Brett v. Pildredge, cited by Windham J. in Goodiar v. Clarke (a), a father, on his daughter's marriage, made a proviso that if his daughter shall die without issue in two years, then her husband shall repay 500*l.* of her portion ; she had issue, and she and it died within two years ; and it was held that the 500*l.* should not be repaid, for by the having of issue the condition was fulfilled. The condition, here, controls the penal part of the bond. The plaintiff can recover only if the business continue to be carried on ; but the obligor is not bound to carry it on. If he is compelled, by force of the obligation, to pay though the business has ceased, it must be said that he is bound to pay 400*l.*, the whole penal sum, though the stock in trade be of less value than 400*l*. If the business was fraudulently given up, that might have been replied. The penal clause must be read with reference to the condition, where there is one which might have been fulfilled; and if the event upon which the fulfilment depended has not happened, that may be pleaded in discharge of the obligation; unless the event failed to happen by the obligor's default. [Alderson B. It is said, on the other side, that you reverse the onus probandi.] We shew enough to divest ourselves of the prima facie liability. [Lord Abinger C. B. Perhaps a distinction may arise where the condition recites an agreement; the bond then seems to be given for securing the performance of such agreement by a penalty; and, if the condition fails, it may be necessary to see whether or not the agreement has been broken; and, if not, then the obligor may not be liable though the events referred to by the condition have not all happened. Thus, in the supposed case of a condition for payment on the arrival of a ship laden with gold dust, it would make a great difference, whether the deed contained simply an obligation followed by such a condition, or whether it first recited an agreement under which the obligor would be liable to pay on the arrival of a ship so laden, but not liable if the ship did not so arrive.] In this case the plaintiff says that the event mentioned in the condition was to discharge; the defendant says it was to make liable. The plaintiff's argument is, in effect, that the obligor is liable to the whole penalty, unless he can discharge himself by paying the minor sum mentioned in the condition. But the defendant's argument is, that he is not liable to pay the penalty, unless liable to pay one of the sums mentioned in the condition. The clause "if upon an account, &c. of the stock in trade of the business if then carried on," &c., is embodied in the subsequent part of the condition by the words "in case upon such account to be taken as aforesaid," &c. If so, he was not liable to pay either of the sums, the business having ceased.

BEAUFORT

Sir W. W. Follett in reply. As to the effect of the recited agreement; that agreement says nothing of any sum but 300*l.*, which is to be paid, within twelve months after the wife's decease, to the persons mentioned in that recital. The conditions added merely regard the amount to be paid; so much, if the property be of such a value, so much, if less. But, if the business be no longer carried on at the time when the valuation should be made, both the contingencies fall to the ground, and the obligation stands good for 300*l.* The obligees would never have consented to an agreement by which the obligor, the day after executing the bond, might sell the property and convert all the proceeds to his own use: for, according to the defendant's construction of the deed, that would have been no fraud. The provision for payment of a minor sum does not imply that nothing was to be paid if the business ceased: to assume so is importing a new stipulation into the deed. [Lord Abinger C. B. The recital is connected with the subsequent part of the deed by the words "in the event hereinafter specified." It would have been folly in the husband to engage himself to carry on the business even though a failing one, or else to pay 300*l.*] An agreement, on the marriage, to pay 300*l.* at all events, would not have been been unreasonable. And on the other hand the wife, who intended to provide for her children, was giving up all the property to him, without any means of obliging him to provide for them, except by this agreement. [Bolland B. And he had this advantage, that he might reduce the stock below the value of 400*l.* by selling off, and then pay only 120*l.*] The bond is, to pay 300*l.* unless the stock should not be worth 400*l.* if the business should be carried on at the time specified. The business not being then carried on, the bond is single; not in the strict sense of the word, but the party claiming the benefit of the condition is not brought within the terms of it. [Alderson B. You mean that it operates as a single bond would.] The doctrine as to the performance and non-performance of conditions by the obligor or obligee, is stated in the judgment of Eyre C. J. in French v. Campbell(a). The way in which the party is to discharge himself in each case will depend on the form of the agreement and condition; but the law is the same. [Wightman referred to Fitz-Hugh v. Dennington(b). Tindal C. J. The request there was not to be the act of the obligor, but of the other party. Alderson J. No breach was shewn. Tindal C. J. Here, if the obligor was bound, as the plaintiff alleges, he has himself shewn a breach of the condition.]

Cur. adv. vult.

TINDAL C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.

The question in this case arises on the construction

(a) 2 H. B. 178. He then read the passage, beginning at "We agree with those," and ending at "condition precedent."

of the condition of a bond, expressed in such terms as to be open to doubt and uncertainty: but, taking the whole of the condition together, we agree in opinion, that the Court of King's Bench have put the proper construction upon the condition, and that the judgment of that Court ought to be affirmed.

The bond appears to us, to have been given to secure the performance of an agreement, entered into between the defendant and the plaintiff, previous to the marriage of the defendant with one Elizabeth Etchells; and the question in the case does therefore become this, what was the real intention of the parties to the agreement as expressed upon the face of it? The agreement is contained, in part, in the recital prefixed to the condition of the bond, and, as to the residue, is to be collected from the condition itself; and taking them both together, the agreement will be found in its terms to be this; that if the marriage then intended should take place, the defendant should within twelve months next after the decease of his intended wife, pay to her child or children by her former husband, the sum of 300*l.*, if upon an account of the stock in trade and effects "if then carried on by the defendant" the same should amount to the sum of 400*l.*; but in case upon such account to be taken as aforesaid, the said stock in trade and effects should amount to less than that sum, then that the defendant should pay to such child or children the sum of 120*l.* within twelve months next after the decease of their mother. And whether it was the intention of the parties to this agreement, that the money should be payable at all events, within twelve months after the wife's death, as contended for by the plaintiff, or that it should be payable only in case the trade continued to be carried on up to the time of the wife's death, as contended for on the part of the defendant, is the question between them.

Now it seems to us to be the proper interpretation of that agreement, that it was made in contemplation of the trade being carried on up to the time of the wife's death; and that the money is to be payable amongst the children, in that event, and in that event only.

The agreement is express, "that the money is to be paid, in the event hereinafter specified." The agreement is also express, "that the stock shall be taken," and that the amount of the sum to be paid shall depend on the value of the stock. The agreement is further express, that the stock is only to be taken, (indeed, it could only be taken), if the trade "be then carried on by the defendant." The event, therefore, which has actually happened, namely, that the trade and business were actually given up and abandoned, long before the wife's death, appears to us to be an event not provided for by the agreement; it is casus omissus, and we think we should make an agreement for the parties, instead of putting a construction upon that which they have made for themselves, if we should hold that the defendant was bound under this condition of the bond, to pay either of the two sums therein mentioned, in the event which has actually taken place. The construction contended for by the plaintiff would either make it compulsory on the husband to carry on the trade during the life of his wife though it became a failing, or even a ruinous concern to the husband; or would render him liable to the payment of the money in the event of his yielding to the pressure of unforeseen circumstances, and of his giving up the business. And we think, if the parties had intended this, they would have used the very simple expedient of making the bond conditional for the payment of a certain sum of money within twelve months after the death of the wife.

We agree entirely in the position laid down by the counsel for the plaintiff in the course of his argument, that when a condition becomes impossible by the act of the obligor, such impossibility forms no answer to an action on the bond. But we differ from him in the application of that principle to the present case; because we think we must infer the intention of the parties to leave it open either to the prudence of the husband, or to casualties, or circumstances which could not be foreseen, to put an end to the trade, and consequently, the liability to pay the money. It is not, therefore, that the obligor has made the performance of the condition impossible by his voluntary act; but that he has exercised a power of closing the concern, which the very condition itself reserved to him.

Upon these grounds, we think the judgment of the Court of King's Bench ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

(Error from the King's Bench.)

*Thursday,
June 18th.PADDON against BARTLETT and Another.*

In an action of debt, for twenty years' rent, commenced July 22d, 1833, on an indenture of demise, the defendants pleaded, 1. Non est factum.

2. (under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 42.)

That no cause of action accrued within six years;

which the plaintiff traversed. 3. and

4. As to seventeen years and three quarters' rent, that on

&c. the plaintiff assigned over all his interest in the premises, and that no part of that rent became due before such assignment. To the last two pleas, the plaintiff pleaded non est factum. The jury found on the first two issues for the plaintiff, without damages, and on the last two for the defendants. Judgment was entered up for the defendants:

Held, on error, by Tindal C. J., and Lord Abinger C. B., that, on this record, assuming the plea founded on the statute to be available, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for two years and a quarter's rent.

But, held by the whole Court of Error, that the plea was not available, for that stat 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 42., as to actions for arrears of rent, is not retrospective.

Quære, Whether the above section, in so far as it limits the bringing of actions for rent to six years after such rent becomes due, &c., be repealed by stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 3., where the rent is reserved by indenture?

Quære, Whether the Court of Error in the Exchequer Chamber can grant a replender?

and

DEBT by the plaintiff in error against the defendants in error, for rent reserved by an indenture of lease, made between the defendants and the plaintiff. The writ was issued, 22d of July 1833. The amount claimed in the declaration was 1600*l.* for twenty years' rent, from February 2d, 1812, to February 2d, 1833.

Pleas: 1. Non est factum.

2. That no part of the rent in the declaration mentioned became or was due, and the causes of action in the declaration mentioned in respect thereof, did not, nor did any or either of them, accrue to the plaintiff within six years next before the commencement of this suit, in manner and form, &c.

3. "As to so much of the said declaration as relates to the sum of 1420*l.*, part of the said rent in the said declaration mentioned, and thereby alleged to be due and owing from the said defendants to the said plaintiff as aforesaid, for the space of seventeen years and three quarters of another year, ending on the said 2d day of February, A. D. 1833 :” that by certain indentures, set out in this plea, the last bearing date 30th of June 1815, the plaintiff conveyed away all his estate and interest in the premises, and his said estate and interest therein became and was, on the last mentioned day, wholly ended and determined; and that no part of the said 1420*l.* became or was due from the defendants to the plaintiff at any time before that day.

4. This plea was also pleaded as to the 1420*l.*; the introduction was the same as in the preceding plea; and the assignment of the plaintiff’s interest by the deed of 30th of June 1815 was stated, with variations which are not material here, and with an averment, as in the third plea, that no part of the 1420*l.* became due before the last-mentioned day.

Replication : 1. Joining issue on the plea of non est factum.

2. That the said causes of action in the second plea and in the declaration mentioned, did accrue &c. Issue tendered and joined.

3. That the plaintiff ought not to be precluded &c. in respect of the part of the rent in the introductory part of the third plea mentioned, because the supposed indenture of 30th of June 1815, in that plea mentioned, is not the deed of the plaintiff. Issue tendered and joined.

4. The like as to the indenture of 30th of June 1815, in the fourth plea mentioned. Issue tendered and joined.

PADDON
against
BARTLETT.

The cause was tried before Lord Denman C. J., at the assizes for the county of Devon, July 1834. The verdict was; on the first issue, that the indenture in the declaration mentioned is the deed of the defendants. On the second issue; that the causes of action did accrue within six years. On the third issue; that the indenture of June 30th, 1815, in the third plea mentioned, is the deed of the plaintiff. On the fourth issue; that the indenture of June 30th, 1815, in the fourth plea mentioned, is the deed of the plaintiff. And the judgment was, that the plaintiff take nothing by his writ, but be in mercy, &c., and that the defendants do recover against the plaintiff 83*l.* for their costs, &c.

The proceedings were returned on writ of error to the Exchequer Chamber, and the following errors were assigned, (Hilary term, 5 W. 4.). "That judgment was given against the said plaintiff, whereas judgment ought to have been given in his favour for the sum of 180*l.*, inasmuch as the third and last pleas (being the only two pleas found for the said defendants), are pleaded in bar to part only of the said action (that is to say), to the sum of 1420*l.*, part of the said rent or sum of 1600*l.* by the said declaration demanded; and, therefore, the said plaintiff is entitled to recover the said sum of 180*l.*, being the difference between the said sum of 1600*l.* above demanded, and the said sum of 1420*l.* covered by the said third and last pleas." And, further, that the second plea is bad in law. And the plaintiff prayed that the judgment might be reversed, and that he might be adjudged to recover the said sum of 180*l.* Joinder in error, of the same term. The case was now argued (a) At the trial of this cause, leave was given to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff on the last two counts, on an objection to the stamp upon the assignment; and likewise to move to enter such damages as the Court might think the plaintiff entitled to on the first two counts; the Lord Chief Justice intimating an opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to any. The motion was made upon the first point (Paddon v. Bartlett, 2 A. & E. 9.), in Michaelmas term, 1834, and a rule refused. Newman, for the plaintiff, then declined moving on the second point, saying, that the plaintiff was authorised by the verdict, as it stood, upon the first two issues, to take judgment for the rest not covered by the pleas found for the defendants. As to this the Court gave no opinion. The plaintiff's attorney afterwards obtained the postea from the associate; whereupon, in the same term, a rule was obtained, calling on the plaintiff's attorney to shew cause why he should not deliver up the postea to the attorneys for the defendants. The Court, after hearing Newman against the rule, and Crowder (who relied upon the several findings on the record), in support of it, made the rule absolute, on the last day of the term.

Judgment was then entered up by the defendants, and a part of the judgment as recorded was, that the plaintiff, as to the last two counts of his declaration, should take nothing by his bill; and that the defendant should recover his costs as to those counts. Error being brought, these variances, among other things, were assigned for error.

Crowder, in Easter term, 1835, (April 15) moved that the Clerk of the treasury of this Court might be directed to amend the entry of the judgment. He moved this on an affidavit, which stated that the deponent had inspected the roll, on which the proceedings were entered on record, and which was filed of record in this Court, and that from such inspection it appeared that the clerk had improperly entered up final judgment, not in accordance with the previous proceedings, the postea, and the finding of the jury, inasmuch as the action was commenced by summons, the declaration contained only one count, and the finding was for the plaintiff

The following variances in entering up a judgment, viz. that the plaintiff, as to certain "counts" (instead of "issues"), take nothing by his "bill" (instead of "writ"), and that the "defendant" (instead of "defendants") recover costs, &c., are clerical errors, which, when ascertained by comparison with the record of proceedings in the cause, the Court will amend, though the judgment be of a past term, and though a writ of error be pending in which these and other errors are assigned.

The Court refused to make such a rule absolute in the first instance.

The party moving must pay the adverse party his costs of such amendment.

Newman for the plaintiff. The plaintiff has obtained a verdict on the first and second pleas: the defendants on the last two only. But, as to rent for two years and a quarter, the last two pleas give no answer; the plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to recover 180*l.*, and the judgment ought to be entered for him. (He was then stopped by the Court.)

Crowder contra. The plea of the statute of limitations was intended to bar the whole of the claim for rent. On production of the demise from the plaintiff to the defendants, it appeared that rent had accrued during the last six years; and, upon that evidence, the jury found for the plaintiff on the second plea; that is, on the first two issues, and for both defendants on the last two. Crowder contended that the variances were clerical errors, which the Court would amend as of course. The Court refused to grant a rule absolute in the first instance, but granted a rule nisi. Newman shewed cause, (May 13) and contended that this judgment, being of a former term, could not be altered; that, at all events, the defendants had been guilty of laches in not making the application sooner; that the errors were not clerical, but the mistake of the party; and that the amendments ought not to be allowed, in a judgment which was in other respects erroneous.

Per Curiam. (Lord Denman C. J., Littleale, Patteson, and Cole-ridge Js.) The plaintiff has suffered no prejudice from the lapse of time, and he is not entitled to say here that the judgment is erroneous in other respects than those now in question. As to these particular errors, the rule must be absolute, on payment of costs by the defendants.

Crowder, for the defendants, submitted, that it was hard on them to pay costs for an error which was not attributable to them, inasmuch as they could not interfere with the postea after it was carried in, but to the officer of the Court.

Per Curiam. We think that the plaintiff ought to have the costs of setting this right, and that the defendants must pay them.

Rule accordingly.

they found, as to that plea, that causes of action had accrued within six years, and within six years only. The plaintiff's demand could not, by stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 42. (a), be carried farther back. But then the defence raised by the third and fourth pleas, viz. that the plaintiff had assigned his interest, covers the six years, and goes back to a period long antecedent; and the jury, having found for the defendants on those pleas, find, in effect, that during the time referred to in them, that is from June 30th, 1815, downwards, the plaintiff had no interest or cause of action. Upon the whole record, therefore, it appears that no debt is due. And the jury have not found any damages. It is as if the defendants had pleaded the statute as to the whole period, except the last six years, and, as to that, the assignment of the plaintiff's interest, and that plea had been found for them. [Tindal C. J. You assume that the jury found, on the plea of the statute, that rent had accrued within

(a) Stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 42. enacts, "That after the said 31st day of December, 1833, no arrears of rent or of interest in respect of any sum of money charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, or in respect of any legacy, or any damages in respect of such arrears of rent or interest, shall be recovered by any distress, action, or suit but within six years next after the same respectively shall have become due, or next after an acknowledgment of the same in writing shall have been given to the person entitled thereto, or his agent, signed by the person by whom the same was payable, or his agent: Provided nevertheless, that where any prior mortgagee or other incumbrancer shall have been in possession of any land, or in the receipt of the profits thereof, within one year next before an action or suit shall be brought by any person entitled to a subsequent mortgage or other incumbrance on the same land, the person entitled to such subsequent mortgage or incumbrance may recover in such action or suit the arrears of interest which shall have become due during the whole time that such prior mortgagee or incumbrancer was in such possession or receipt as aforesaid, although such time may have exceeded the said term of six years."

the last six years. Lord Abinger C. B. Suppose it had been proved that the defendants, within the six years, had given a written acknowledgment or promise in respect of rent due nineteen years ago.] The Court will not make a supposition against the judgment. [Tindal C. J. The difficulty you are under as to the plea of the statute arises from your not having pleaded according to the fact. If you had done so, you might have obliged the plaintiff to reply that a part of the causes of action, viz. the last six years' rent, accrued within six years. As it is, the replication may apply to a cause of action in respect of any part of the rent.] It is true that the verdict might have been as it is, if a written acknowledgment had been proved, respecting rent due nineteen years back. But the question is whether, upon any supposition, the judgment can be supported. [Lord Abinger C. B. If the last two pleas had not been pleaded, and the verdict had been given, as here, upon the first two, what do you say the result would have been?] That would have been a verdict for the plaintiff as to the last six years. [Alderson B. No; as to the whole.] The jury, having found for the plaintiff on the plea of the statute, but given no damages, and having found for the defendants on the assignment, have in effect found that, although the plaintiff's case on the plea of the statute was supported, the assignment was an answer. [Lord Abinger C. B. If the assignment left the plaintiff no cause of action during the six years, the verdict should have been for the defendants on the plea of the statute. But we are bound, if possible, to suppose such a case as will support the verdict: and that case may be such a written acknowledgment as has been suggested, or a payment of interest. The judgment is only a conclusion from the verdict. The circumstances of the jury not having given damages is no reason that the plaintiff should not have judgment. We must take the record as it stands, and see if the declaration is not sustained as to so much time as is not covered by the last two pleas.] If the defendants are wrong on this point, the Court will probably grant a venire de novo. [Tindal C. J. It should be a repleader; and I doubt if we can award that. The most satisfactory course would be, that, on payment of costs, you should be allowed to amend your plea, and go to trial again on the real point in dispute. But we should wish to hear the other side on the question, whether the statute 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. extends to this case; because, if the second plea is bad in law, the amendment would be of no use.]

1835.

Newman, for the plaintiff. The writ issued, July 22d, 1833. The statute 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. received the Royal assent, July 24th, 1833, and it enacts (sect. 42.) that, after the 31st of December in that year, no arrears of rent "shall be recovered" by any distress, action, or suit, but within six years next after the same shall have become due, &c. That does not apply to an action commenced before the statute passed. The intention was that, after the 31st of December, no person should bring an action for the causes mentioned in sect. 42. The intention to limit the right, not of recovering in actions already begun, but of commencing actions or other proceedings in future, is plainly expressed in sect. 2. and sect. 40. of the same statute, and

in stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. sect. 3., which is in pari materia. Again, supposing even that stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 42. were retrospective, it applies only to rents on parol demises, not on demises by specialty, which latter rents appear to be provided for by sect. 40. [Lord Abinger C. B. If none but rents on parol demises were contemplated, the stat. 21 Ja. 1. c. 16. s. 3. would have been sufficient.] That does not bar the right of distress. But further, if the forty-second section applies to rents secured by specialty, it may be a question whether it is not virtually repealed as to the limitation of time by stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 3., which enacts that "all actions of debt for rent upon an indenture of demise," which "shall be sued or brought" after the end of that session of parliament, "shall be commenced and sued" within ten years after the end of the session, or twenty years after the cause of action. The Court here called upon

Crowder, contra. It must be admitted that, if the plea of the statute be bad, the defendants' pleadings cover only seventeen years and three quarters, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover 180*l*. But the statute does operate on actions already brought. The sections referred to as shewing a contrary intention are not to be so considered. [Alderson B. The words of the proviso in sect. 42. of stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. are "within one year next before an action or suit shall be brought."] That proviso refers only to one subject, distinct from rent. Sect. 40. cannot apply to rents. The words are, "no action or suit," &c., "to recover any sum of money," "charged upon or payable out of any land or rent."

rent." The legislature cannot have meant to speak of a rent as "payable out of a rent." Sect. 3. of stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42., as it regards the present subject, seems to have been a mistake of the legislature. [Lord Abinger C. B. I cannot interpret away the words "all actions of debt for rent upon an indenture of demise."] At all events the latter statute does not repeal the former. It was indeed needless, after enacting that no debt of a certain class should be recovered but within six years, to say that all actions for such debt shall be brought within twenty years; but still the defendants may rely upon the first enactment, as not contradicted by the second. Several cases on other statutes are favourable to the retrospective construction of this; as Towler v. Chatterton (a). [Tindal C. J. The question there was, whether, when the cause came on to be tried, the Judge was to be governed, in receiving evidence, by that which was then the law of the land. Lord Abinger C. B. The enactment relied upon there, had particular words which made it applicable, after a certain time, to suits already depending.] Freeman v. Moyes (b) and Pickup v. Wharton (c) (on stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 31.) also favour the retrospective construction. Here, as in those cases, the statute takes effect upon an action already depending. The action, when commenced, may have been in proper time; but the statute intervenes and prevents the recovery. [Lord Abinger C. B. You must contend that the words of stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 42. are as strong as those of & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 31.; "in every action brought by any executor," "such executor" "shall be liable." And you must say that, if proceedings at law or in equity, were commenced in good time, subsequently to the stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27., but the recovery were put off, as by delay in obtaining a decree in Chancery, the plaintiff must be barred.] That is an argument from inconvenience, which cannot govern the construction of an act. [Alderson B. In the case of executors the inconvenience attached only to actions then commenced; here it would be felt through all future times.] The difference of language in this section and in sect. 40. (where it is said that "no action shall be brought,") shews a difference of intention. [Alderson B. The words here are, that no arrears of rent "shall be recovered;" recovering is by bringing an action. The words used as to rent are also used, in the same section, as to legacies; and in sect. 43. it is enacted that no person claiming any legacy "for the recovery of which he might bring an action or suit at law or in equity, shall bring a suit or other proceeding in any spiritual Court to recover the same but within the period during which he might bring such action or suit at law or in equity."] Another authority for construing the words retrospectively is Cox v. Thomason (a). The letter of the statute is in favour of the defendants; and the correct rule is to construe acts of parliament according to their grammatical and natural sense, unless the context shew clearly that a different sense was intended: Rex v. Ditchet, per Parke J. (b). This rule was lately followed by the

TINDAL C. J. We are all of opinion that the plea of the statute of limitations is bad. Admitting that the case depends on stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 42., and not on stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 3., still we think that the clause in question is prospective only, not retrospective, and therefore does not affect this action. The language of the clause itself shews this; for it enacts that, after a future day, no arrears of rent shall be recovered by any action, but within six years after the same shall have become due. The natural import of that is, that the act shall have no operation till the day named, and therefore shall not take effect, by being pleaded, in an action commenced before that day; such at least would be the construction, unless there were other words to the contrary. And in the same section of the act there is a proviso, that, where any prior mortgagee shall have been in possession within one year next before an action shall be brought by any person entitled to a subsequent mortgage, that person may recover in such action or suit the arrears of interest for the whole time that such prior mortgagee was in possession, though exceeding six years. Why are we to suppose that the first clause relates to actions commenced in bygone time, when the proviso refers only to future ones? Both are in pari materia; and it is no sufficient reason for construing them differently, that the last has some words which are wanting in the first. We ought to be careful of construing statutes so as to abridge the rights of parties in actions already commenced. Upon the whole of this record there must be judgment for the plaintiff for 180*l*.

Lord ABINGER C. B. I am of the same opinion. When a statute fixes the precise day at which its provisions shall take effect, I should not easily suppose that it pointed at any thing to be done in the intermediate time. Courts, in general, will not construe acts as retrospective unless the meaning is very plain. It is true that, if the words of a statute are plain, they must be strictly followed; but, if they are ambiguous, the whole context must be looked to for the explanation. If that were not done here, we must come to a conclusion which would cut off rights of parties in actions commenced before the statute came into operation.

The rest of the Court concurred.

END OF TRINITY VACATION.

[The following case is printed out of its regular order, for the purpose of bringing it into the same volume with the special verdict, set out in the former case, p. 3. antè. Many of the authorities cited in the following argument are given more fully in the previous report, to which accordingly frequent reference has been made:—]

IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

JOHN LUMLEY SAVILE, Earl of SCARBOROUGH, against DOE on the demise of FREDERICK LUMLEY SAVILE, Esquire.

THREE actions of ejectment were brought against the father of the plaintiff in error, one for lands in Dur- Lands were devised to R. for life; remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; remainder to R.'s first and other sons successively in tail male: remainder to J., R.'s younger brother, for life; remainder to trustees to preserve &c.; remainder to J.'s first and other sons successively in tail male: remainder to F., another younger brother of R.; remainder to trustees to preserve &c.; remainder to F.'s first and other sons successively in tail male: remainders to other younger brothers of R.; and (after remainders to preserve, &c.) remainders respectively to their sons successively in tail male: remainders over.

The will contained two provisoes.

First, that every person and persons who, by virtue of the will, should become entitled to certain premises, being part of the lands devised, should, within two years after he and they should severally become so entitled, take upon himself and themselves the surname of S., jointly with any dignity or title that might be vested in him or them, and quarter the arms of S. with his or their own family arms, and take such means as might be requisite to enable him or them respectively so to do; and, in case any such person or persons should refuse or neglect so to do, then the limitation to him or them (such neglect, &c., being made during the lives of R. or of any of his younger brothers, living at the devisor's decease, or within twenty-one years after the survivor's decease) should cease, determine, and become utterly void; and the lands should immediately go to the person next in remainder under the will, in the same manner as if such person or persons so neglecting, &c., being tenant or tenants for life, was or were dead, or, being tenant or tenants in tail, was or were dead without issue male, without prejudice to such jointures, portions, terms, &c., as, by virtue of powers afterwards contained in the will, should have been limited, &c., before such ceasing or determination of the estate of the person or persons so neglecting, &c.

Secondly, that, if the title to a certain earldom (which was the only dignity or title shewn to exist in the family) should descend to any of them the said R., J., F., &c., or to any of their sons (within any of the lives, &c., as before), then, and in such case, and as and when the title should come to him or them, the estate which he or they should then

then be entitled to in the lands, under or by virtue of the will, should cease, determine, and become void; and the lands should immediately go to the person and persons who, under the limitations aforesaid, should then be next in remainder expectant on the decease and failure of issue male of the person to whom the title should so come, in the same manner as such person or persons so in remainder would take the same by virtue of the will, in case he or they to whom the title should come was or were actually dead without issue; such person and persons so in remainder complying with the first proviso: provided that any such cesser of the estate of the person or persons to whom the title should come should not prejudice, &c. (as before, for preserving jointures, &c.).

J. being in possession, a common recovery was suffered, in which the lands were conveyed (by lease and release by J. and his eldest son) to a tenant to the praepice for the joint lives of such tenant and J., and J.'s eldest son was vouched over, but J. was not vouched; and the uses of the recovery were declared to be to J. for life, remainder over.

While J. was in possession, F. and his eldest son, by deed truly reciting the facts, released their interest to trustees, who were strangers in interest, habendum to and to the use of the trustees in fee, upon such trusts as should correspond with the uses and trusts which had been declared of the recovery; and F. and his eldest son covenanted with the trustees that they had not encumbered or impeached, and for further assurance.

F. having died, and his eldest son having brought ejectment against J.: Held, (Assuming, first, that the second proviso was capable of operating more than once, and was not at an end upon the descent of the title to R. :

Assuming, secondly, that the proviso, upon the title coming to a tenant for life, determined the estates both of such tenant for life and of all his sons :

Assuming, thirdly, that the plaintiff was not barred or estopped by the release to the trustees, or by the above-mentioned covenants :))

That the second proviso created no new estate on the descent of the title; that the lessor of the plaintiff could claim only by virtue of the limitation expectant upon the estate tail of J.'s eldest son; and that the recovery defeated such a limitation, and was therefore a bar to the ejectment.

in Nottinghamshire. The first was brought in the Court of Pleas of the county palatine of Durham, the other two in the King's Bench. In the first, a special verdict was found and judgment entered for the defendant in the Court of Pleas of the county palatine, which was reversed on error in the Court of King's Bench; antè, p. 2. On that judgment error was brought in the House of Lords (and not in the Exchequer Chamber, as stated antè, p. 46). In the two actions for the lands in Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire, the same special verdict (a) was found, and judgment entered for the plaintiff in both, in the King's Bench, of Michaelmas term 1834. The defendant below having died, error was brought, in the Exchequer Chamber, on the judgment in the action for the lands in

By consent of the parties, the special verdict was amended, by inserting, in the finding of the lease and release of July 1st and 2d, 1817 (antè, p. 11. line 24.), the following portion of the deed:—

Sir W. W. Follett for the plaintiff in error.

In applying the principle, that the intention of the testator is to be regarded, the Court will collect the intention from the terms which he uses in the will, and not from the result which subsequent events may produce. The Court below appears to have founded its judgment upon the effect which the recovery, if it operated as a bar, would have in defeating the testator's intention. This reasoning is inadmissible: a recovery almost always defeats the limitations upon which it acts; but the effect of the limitations, in themselves, must be collected without reference to the effect which a recovery would produce upon them.

The plaintiff in error insists upon five points.

I. The proviso for shifting the estates in the event of the descent of the title was capable of operating only once; and, therefore, after it had operated, upon the descent of the title to Earl Richard, it was at an end.

II. Assuming that the proviso was to operate more than once, still, upon the title devolving on a tenant for life, the estates of his sons were not made to cease.

III. If the plaintiff in error should not succeed on the above points, still the proviso created no new interests, but merely gave a determinable quality to the

SCARBOROUGH
against

estates avoided, so as to accelerate and bring into possession the estates in remainder; and therefore the recovery barred those estates in remainder.

IV. If it did create new interests, such interests were nevertheless barred by the recovery.

V. The lessor of the plaintiff below was at any rate precluded from maintaining this action by the deeds of 1817.

I. The proviso is to divest vested interests; such a proviso is to be construed strictly, and not extended by implication. This was laid down in Doe dem. Luscombe v. Yeates (a).

The Court below appear not to have felt the importance of the question, whether the proviso could operate more than once; for they say (p. 45.) that, even if the words do not point to a succession of persons, "still the lessor of the plaintiff may take an estate in tail; and it is not necessary now to determine, whether those in remainder after him can take any thing or not." But, if they can take nothing, the lessor of the plaintiff below could himself take nothing; for the proviso had operated once, before the event upon which he claims had occurred.

The Court below assume (p. 45.) that it was clearly the deviser's intention that his estates should never go in the same line, or to the same persons, as the earldom. It lies on the lessor of the plaintiff below to shew that this intention appears in the will. The words are (p. 7.) "then and in such case, and as and when" the title shall fall in possession. "As and when" do not more obviously mean "when and as soon," than "when and as often," or "when, and in every such case as." And, again, the proviso (p. 7.) speaks only of the person, not persons, to whom the said title shall so descend. Yet the testator knew how to frame a proviso which would operate successively; for he has actually done so in the instance of the proviso relating to the name and arms, where he uses the words (pp. 5 and 6.) "every person and persons," "himself and themselves," "his or their own family arms," "any such person or persons shall refuse," "him or them so neglecting," &c. Clauses for successively shifting estates are not uncommon, though perhaps they are not often applied to the event of the descent of a title: a precedent may be found in 1 Sanders on Uses and Trusts, Appendix, No. II. p. 382 (a), where the expression is "then, and in that case, and so often as the same shall happen." A proper form may be found also in Butler's note (2) (II. 2) to Littleton, s. 596, p. 327. a. Indeed the will shews that, upon any construction of the proviso, the testator actually did contemplate, in some events, the union of the estates and the title. If the defendant below, John Lumley Savile, and his eldest son, had both died, leaving a grandson by the eldest son, and then Earl Richard had died without issue, such grandson would have taken both the estate and the title: and a second son of the defendant below would, on the death of such grandson (being Earl) have taken the estate and title at the same moment, so that the proviso would not have applied, and the estate would not have shifted. So the ultimate remainder man, the right heir of the testator, might take both the estates and title. Further, the proviso as to the name and arms (p. 5.) requires the party taking the estate to bear the surname of Savile "jointly with any dignity or title that may be vested in him." Now, as there was no dignity or title in the family except the earldom of Scarborough, the testator seems to have had in view the event of the same person enjoying the estates and the earldom. At all events, no necessary implication as to the shifting of the estate more than once arises; and the case is within the principle laid down in Lord Eldon's judgment in Wilkinson v. Adam on the subject of implication (a).

II. The clause, in the proviso, which directs the cesser of the estate of the person to whom the title descends, would, of itself, merely let in the estate of the son of the defendant below, upon the defendant himself becoming earl. But the latter part of the proviso is relied upon on the other side. The estates are to go to the person next in remainder expectant on the decease and failure of issue male of the person taking the title, as if the latter were actually dead without issue. It is contended that this excludes the issue of the person taking the title. But this construction leads to inconsistencies. If the defendant below had died before Earl Richard, and if the defendant's son had been in possession at Earl Richard's death, then the estate must have gone over to the second son of the defendant. It is not likely to have been intended that the second and other sons of the tenants for life should be excluded upon the contingency merely of the title descending upon the tenant for life, but should be let in if it descended on the tenant in tail.

(a) 1 V. & B. 466.; and see Driver dem. Frank v. Frank, 3 M. & S. 31, 36.

III. It has been conceded, and will not be disputed, that all the remainders were vested. This is then the common case of a recovery by a tenant in tail, with the concurrence of the tenant for life in possession, barring all the remainders. But then it is said that the proviso created new interests, and that the several parties in remainder had, in addition to their vested estates in remainder, other interests, as possibilities, by way of executory devise or shifting use. This was assumed at the bar, and in the judgment of the Court, below, but was not supported by either authority or argument. It will be shewn that no new interests were created, but one set of estates only, namely, remainders to come into possession, either on the natural determination of the prior estates, or on their earlier determination by the devolution of the earldom.

If the testator's intention can be accomplished by holding that remainders only were created, then the Court is bound by the rules of law to treat the estates as remainders, and not as executory devises or shifting uses. There is nothing to prevent this intention being accomplished by means of remainders, and these only. There is no necessity, in order to carry his intention into effect, to nullify, on every shifting, all the limitations of the will, and to create a thorough and complete new series. In any point of view, the supposed intention of the testator could be defeated by a recovery; it is admitted that the present claimant, should he succeed, could, as being tenant in tail in possession, bar the further operation of the proviso.

It is a rule that, if an interest can be supported as a remainder, it shall not be construed as taking effect by way of executory devise or shifting use; Purefoy v.

[1836.] Rogers (a), and cases in note (9) to p. 388. of that case; Lord Northington's remarks in Carwardine v. Carwardine (b); Doe dem. Mussell v. Morgan (c), and Lord Kenyon's remarks there; Sugden's note to Gilbert on Uses, p. 171. Now here there is nothing to prevent the interests taking effect as remainders. The parties claiming on the devolution of the title claim only that which, in case the title had not devolved, would have come into possession when, but not before, the estate tail had determined; so that it is merely an acceleration of the remainder. The case is not like that of an interest limited to a new family having no interest antecedently limited; though, even in such a case, the new family would not take by way of shifting use or executory devise.

SCARBOROUGH
against
DOE dem.

It is also a rule that, wherever a limitation can be held to be vested, it shall not be construed as contingent; Driver dem. Frank v. Frank (d). Here there are no words of contingency. The devise gives vested interests in the first instance; and the proviso merely annexes a determinable quality.

Suppose land given to A. in tail, and, if he die without issue, to B. in fee, with a proviso that, if A. marry, his estate shall cease and B. take as if A. were dead without issue: B. could not be considered to take different interests on the two events. Suppose, again, a devise to testator's wife for life, remainder to C. in fee, with a proviso that, if the wife marry again, her estate shall cease, and the land go over as if she were dead: C. has simply a vested remainder to take effect on either event. Suppose, in such case, C. charged his remainder with incumbrances, and the widow married again, could C. avoid the incumbrances on the ground that he was in of a new estate? The same reasoning applies to the present case.

In Newis v. Lark (a) (commonly cited as Scolastica's Case) the facts were these:—Henry Clerk devised to his son John Clerk in tail male, remainder to testator's son Francis in tail male, remainder to testator's daughter Scolastica in tail male, remainders over in tail, and the final remainder in fee to one of the city companies; and there was a clause as follows:—"I would none of the entailees" "to alien, bargain, sell," &c., "but every one successively" shall "use and take the commodity and profit of the same," &c. "According to which my devise" "I will," "that if any of the said persons before entailed," &c. "or their heirs, do" "mortgage, bargain, sell," &c. "then and from thenceforth all and every such person and persons, and his or their heirs," "shall forthwith be clearly discharged, excluded, and dismissed as touching the said entail of mine, and the conveyance by words foregoing of the entail of my said lands and tenements towards him or them to be of no force, benefit, or advantage towards him or them, but the same my lands and tenements immediately to descend and come unto the party next in tail unto him or them, as effectually as if such disorderous person or persons had never been minded of in this my present testament and last will." Such a proviso against alienation would now be held totally void; but, as the Court in that case assumed the validity of the proviso, and entered into the consideration of the effect produced by it upon the limitation, their decision as to this last point may be applied to the case of the present proviso. John (being in possession), and Francis, for 300*l.*, covenanted with Lark that John and his wife should levy a fine to Lark, and that afterwards a recovery should be had against Lark, in which Lark should vouch John, who should vouch Francis, who should vouch the common vouchee: and John gave Francis 40*l.* for his concurrence. The fine was levied, and the recovery suffered. John died without issue; and the plaintiffs, one of whom was Scolastica, claimed against Lark the defendant. All the Judges (a) agreed that the acts done were within the clause. "But the great doubt was whether the penalty, which Henry Clerk has added to the act done to take away the tail, be a condition, or a limitation and no condition, and how it stands with law, and who shall defeat the tails, and by what means. And as to this, all the Justices argued that it is no condition, for if it should be a condition, and should be broken by any in possession or in remainder, then the heir, to whom the privity of conditions in inheritances descends, should enter, and thereby defeat all the estates:" which was not the devisor's intention. "(b) Further it was moved, that if the penalty shall not amount to a condition containing a re-entry, whether or no it shall be a limitation in estate, and if it be a limitation, whether entry is necessary before it be ended, and whether the next in remainder be privy enough to make entry." . . . "And as to this all the Justices argued, that the clause in the will which saith, that the person mortgaging or entangling shall be clearly discharged," &c., "touching the entail, and that the conveyance of the entail shall be of no force, benefit, or advantage towards him or them," shall be taken and expounded in law as a limitation, that is to say, it shall be taken in sense to be a devise to him in tail, until he mortgage, alien, pledge, entangle, incumber, or does the other acts there expressed. And when he shall do any of these acts, then the estate shall end as fully as if he had died without issue male; so that after the act done the right of the tail shall cease, and the tail is merely dissolved. As if land is given to a man in tail as long as J. S. shall have issue of his body, or until J. S. shall die without issue of his body, there if J. S. dies without issue, the land shall revert, and the freehold in law shall be presently cast upon the donor, so that he has the possession in law before entry. And as fully is the estate and right of the entail ended in this case here, when he does any of the acts, for when the intent is shewn by words, and the words are not aptly put, then such sense ought to be put upon the words as is suitable to the intent; and forasmuch as in sense such words amount to limitations, they shall be taken as a limitation, and especially when the case is upon a devise, where the intent only is regarded, and the words, although they are not apt in law for the matter, shall be drawn to the intent." "Wherefore inasmuch as it appears here to be the intent of the devisor, that he who does any of these acts shall lose his estate-tail, the law, which is desirous that the intent should be observed, says that the tail is limited to continue until the act prohibited is done; and so it is consonant to law. And Dyer resembled this to the case of an action causa matrimonii prælocuti, where the estate shall be defeated by the intent, without an express condition in deed. And so where land is given to husband and wife during the coverture, or as long as such a one is abbot of such a place, these are times of limitations, and the estate shall end if the husband or wife die in the one case, and if the abbot be deposed in the other case." . . . "(a) And Dyer cited a conveyance which Fitz-James, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, caused to be made to his wife in Anno 28 H. 8. which he had seen, whereby Elizabeth his wife had an estate for life with remainder over, upon condition that if she should make a discontinuance of other land which was assured to her, that then her estate should cease, and he in remainder should enter. And it is to be presumed that he being Chief-Justice made this estate with the assent of the other Justices who were his companions, and that they took it that the condition there expressed was not a condition, but a limitation which should end the estate of his wife, so that that being determined, he in remainder should enter. And if it shall be so in that case where it was by deed, a fortiore shall it be so here where it is by last will, in which the intent rules the words, and not the words the intent." . . . "And all the Justices agreed upon the matter in law, viz. that the said clause of restraint shall be a limitation which shall determine the estates, and not a condition requiring re-entry." The intent, which was relied upon in that case, is equally clear in the present: it is manifest that the testator meant that the estate of any one, upon whom the title should descend, should cease exactly as if it had not been created by the will, or as if the person were dead without issue. Those "next in remainder," who are entitled "under the limitations aforesaid," are to take "in the same manner" as on the natural expiration of the preceding estates. With respect to the argument suggested (pp. 18, 19.), that the repetition of the proviso as to the name and arms would have been unnecessary if the estates let in upon the descent of the title were the estates previously limited, the answer is that the repetition is unnecessary even upon the construction contended for on the other side; for the original clause for taking the name and arms applied to every person becoming entitled "by virtue of this my will;" which comprehends as well new estates as the remainders first limited.

SCARBOROUGH

Newis v. Lark (a) has often been referred to, as establishing the principle that the effect of the limitation is simply to determine the first estate, as for instance in Fearne's Contingent Remainders, 272. It is also discussed in Mary Portington's Case (b), where Lord Coke makes two objections; one, that the proviso is bad at law, which is true, but which does not destroy the authority of the case as to the point now in discussion; the other, that the words create a strict condition. The second objection would not now be upheld: but it was, at any rate, not denied that the proviso, if it created a conditional limitation, had the effect of simply determining the precedent estate. And, as to this, the authority of Newis v. Lark (a) has never been impugned. This proviso was afterwards under consideration in Sharington v. Minors (c), where a remainder-man recovered on the forfeiture of Scolastica: and, although Popham C. J. differed from the rest of the Court, that was merely on the question whether there was not a discontinuance: the effect of the proviso as simply letting in the remainder was not denied.

In The Lady Anne Fry's Case (a) a man devised to his grand-daughter in tail, on condition that she married with the consent of certain persons, and, if she married without such consent, or died without issue, remainder over in fee. She married without the consent; and the remainder-man recovered. The Court considered that, by the marriage, the remainder became vested in possession. Thus Rainsford J. says that the words "must be taken as a limitation, to support the intent of the devisor, and so let in the remainder which he limits over." And Hale C. J. said "'T is as much as if he had said, and if she marries, &c. then to remain, without the word condition." . . . "Here is an estate tail devised to the defendant, subject to limitations, the one of law, viz. dying without issue; the other express and in fact, (viz.) marrying without the consent, &c. and both are coupled together; so that whenever she marries without consent, &c. her estate determines and is transferred to him in the remainder, without either entry or claim. 'T is all one as if the estate had been devised to her for life, and if she marries, then to remain, which had been but an estate quamdiu sola vixerit."

Page v. Hayward (b) is to the same effect. The suggestion, that the proviso created new estates, appears in no one of the cases: the proviso is always treated as qualifying the antecedent gift, as if it had been expressly incorporated with it.

The lessor of the plaintiff below must shew under what limitations he claims. Now his claim can be supported only on the supposition that, upon each descent of the title to a fresh branch of the family, toties quoties, the limitations to that and the younger branches are immediately avoided, and that a fresh set of limitations are created, exactly like the old one, and with the same proviso annexed. So violent a construction will not be adopted, in the absence of express words, or of some peremptory rule of law.

The practice of conveyancers is inconsistent with the supposition that the estates taking effect upon the descent of the title are new estates. When conveyancers intend to create new estates, they insert a clause directing the cesser, not merely of the prior estates, but of all those created by the original limitation; 1 Sand. Uses and Trusts, Appendix, No. II. 382 (a). In a manuscript of the late Mr. Buller, which is well known to the profession, the following passage occurs. "When an estate is limited to A. for life, remainder to B. in fee, with a proviso to determine A.'s life estate on the happening of a particular event, there, on the happening of that event, the life estate determines, and the remainder overtakes immediate effect in possession. By this; the remainder takes effect in possession before the natural expiration of the preceding estate, and is therefore said to be accelerated. It is sometimes practised, in these cases, to insert in the clause determining the life estate a declaration that, on the determination of that life estate, the lands shall immediately go over to the remainder man. But this is unnecessary, as, by the

This doctrine, that, on the avoidance of a particular estate, the next immediate remainder takes effect, if the remainder man be in existence, is conformable to the authorities. Such are Lord Hardwicke's remarks in Avelyn v. Ward (a), where the point was admitted; 18 Viner's Abridgment, 394, Remainder (G). pl. 9. The same point was assumed in Doe dem. Kenrick v. Lord Wm. Beaucherk (b), and in Gulliver dem. Corrie v. Ashby (c).

IV. A recovery bars, not only remainders expectant upon the estate of the party suffering the recovery, but collateral limitations which would have the effect of determining that estate. It is true that it does not bar estates antecedent to the estate of such party, nor charges upon his estates. It is contended, on the other side, that the proviso is annexed to the life estate, and therefore interposed antecedently to the remainder in tail. But it is not confined, in its operation, to determining the life estate; it puts an end also to the remainder in tail, unless it be said that the proviso is to be construed divisibly, so as to determine the life estate in one event, and the estate tail in the other. But such a construction would, as the event is, leave the estate tail in remainder still undefeated, which will not be contended for on the other side. The proviso, therefore, defeated the estate tail; and, that being so, the recovery barred the proviso. Roper v. Hallifax (d) was cited in the King's Bench on this point: but, supposing that decision to be good law, it was the case of a power; and it is a rule that the interests created by appointment under a power take effect as if they had been created by the instrument creating the power, and thus have precedence of the estates which they defeat; cases cited in Isherwood v. Oldknow (a). A proviso for shifting uses is not so construed; and, in Roper v. Hallifax (b), it was admitted that a shifting use would be barred by the recovery. A tenant in fee simple, possessing also a power of appointment, may defeat his wife's right to dower, which has previously attached, by exercising the power; Ray v. Pung (c). But an executory limitation would not have such an effect; Buckworth v. Thirkell (d), Moody v. King (e). Again, in Roper v. Hallifax (b), the intention of the deed was to preserve the power, not to destroy it; and the intention in such a case is taken into consideration in interpreting the effect of the power and recovery; Earl of Jersey v. Deane (g), Tyrrell v. Marsh (h), Davies v. Bush (i).

V. In the first place, the right of the lessor of the plaintiff below was assignable; Jones v. Roe, Lessee of Perry (k), Doe dem. Cooper v. Finch (l). It is a possibility coupled with an interest.

Secondly, such interest was, at any rate, releasable to the party having the freehold. It is true that the deed purports to convey to trustees: but, if a deed cannot operate in one way to effect the intention, it shall operate in another; as in Tomlinson v. Dighton (m). It is clear that the parties conveying meant, for good consideration, to give up all their interest. The deed may therefore be construed as a release.

Thirdly. The lessor of the plaintiff below cannot maintain the ejectment, contrary to his deed. A party who covenants not to sue on a covenant is barred of his action, though there be no express release; Goodtitle dem. Edwards v. Bailey (a); cases cited in Right dem. Jefferys v. Bucknell (b); Dean v. Newhall (c). Here the covenants against incumbrances, and for further assurance, are inconsistent with the claim of the lessor of the plaintiff below.

Sir John Campbell, Attorney-General, for the defendant in error.

I. As to the deeds of 1817, they furnish a ground only for applying to a court of equity. Since the death of Lord Mansfield the courts of law have uniformly disregarded interests merely equitable. In Goodtitle dem. Edwards v. Bailey (a) the legal estate in fact did prevail. It is true that a dictum of Lord Mansfield may be found in that case in favour of the equitable title against the legal, in ejectment; but that dictum has been considered bad law from the time of Lord Kenyon; Adams on Ejectment, ch. 3. (d), Halford v. Dillon (e), Shannon v. Bradstreet (g).

First, the deeds of 1817 could not operate at law by way of transferring a legal interest, because the lessor of the plaintiff below had, at the time of executing the deeds, merely a possibility of interest, dependent upon the contingency of the uses shifting: and the trustees, to whom the conveyance is made, were mere strangers without any interest whatever. In the ordinary case of a lease and release, the bargain and sale for a year conveys an immediate possession by the operation of the statute of uses: but here the bargainor had no possession to convey. The release, by common law, enlarges the estate of the person already in possession through the bargain and sale, but here is no such possession. A possibility is assignable or transferrable in equity, but not at law, to a stranger; Carter's Case (a); Lampel's Case (b); Poole v. Haskey (c); The Earl of Kent v. Steward (d); Doe dem. Brune v. Martyn (e); Whitfield v. Fausset (g); Wright v. Wright (h); Sheppard's Touchstone, 239, 431.; 2 Preston on Conveyancing, 268.; Watkins on Conveyancing, book i. ch. 14. In Jones v. Roe, Lessee of Perry (i), it was held that a possibility was devisable; but that decision was upon the particular wording of the statutes of wills (32 H. 8. c. 1. s. 1., and 34 & 35 H. 8. c. 5. s. 4.), and does not affect the question of assignability. There are many decisions to the effect that such an interest is assignable in equity: such is Doe dem. Shaw v. Steward (k), where the marginal note indeed states that the interest there in question was held to be assignable at law, but the case shews only that such an interest of a bankrupt passes to his assignees; which it would do on the ground of their taking all that he can assign either at law or in equity. But there is no authority for the interest being assignable at law.

Secondly, the deeds of 1817 cannot operate by way of estoppel, because they disclose the fact that the party conveying had only a possibility; note (1) to Butler's Co. Litt. 352 a.; Co. Lit. 352 b.; Hermitage v. Tomkins (a); Poole v. Haskey (b); Right dem. Jefferys v. Bucknell (c).

Thirdly, the deeds cannot operate as a release. It is true that, where a party, suing in covenant, has covenanted not to sue the defendant, the law construes the covenant of the plaintiff as a release, to avoid circuity of action; but here John Doe has executed no deed, and therefore the action cannot be released. Tomlinson v. Dighton (d) proceeded upon the intention; here the intention manifestly was to transfer the possible interest of the lessor of the plaintiff to, and to the use of, the trustees, upon trust for the benefit of the ter-tenant. But this intention is inconsistent with a release to the ter-tenant. Besides, the covenants are only against incumbrances and for further assurance; there is no covenant not to bring ejectment, nor even for quiet enjoyment; though such covenants would not operate as a release.

II. As to the argument, that the proviso could operate only once. The expressions "him or them," "he or they," and (in the concluding clause of the proviso (e)) "person or persons," shew that the proviso was intended to operate successively, toties quoties, and that this is the meaning to be attached to the words "as and when." It is true that a case may be put, as in the event of the title and estate descending to a grandson of any tenant for life, in which the title and estate might be held together. But it is not necessary for the plaintiff below to shew that no possible case can arise in which this will happen; it is sufficient to shew that the testator has expressly provided that the union shall not take place in the event which has actually happened. And Lord Eldon's dictum in Wilkinson v. Adams (a) cannot be applied to control the effect of an express proviso.

III. As to the argument that the proviso would carry the estate over, upon the descent of the title on Earl John, not to the lessor of the plaintiff below, but to the son of Earl John: the proviso directs that the land shall go to the person or persons next in remainder expectant on the decease and failure of issue male of the person to whom the title shall descend. It is true that, if a tenant in tail become earl, his brother would take the estate, and not his uncle, as would have been the case if the title had descended upon the tenant for life. There is, however, no inconsistency in such a result. The estates are still kept in a line of descent distinct from that of the title; and in each event the issue of the party becoming earl is excluded. This is not a proviso of forfeiture like the proviso respecting the name and arms, where the estate is carried over to the son of the party not complying with the direction of the will; and it is reasonable that the two provisos should operate differently.

IV. As to the effect of the recovery. It has been asked, under what limitations the lessor of the plaintiff below claims. The answer is, that he claims under the new use which the proviso creates, the proviso substantially declaring that a new set of uses shall arise whenever the title descends to a tenant for life entitled to the estates "under or by virtue of this my will." This interest is not barred by the recovery, which is merely the recovery of the remainder man in tail: the tenant for life, the defendant, was not vouched: and, even in the deed creating a tenant to the præcipe, in which the defendant below did join, the reversion for life was left in him, and could not be affected by the recovery, neither could the estates of the trustees for preserving contingent remainders. The interest now claimed was not barred, any more than it would have been barred by a recovery suffered by any member of the younger branches of the family. Indeed there is no more ground for contending that the lessor of the plaintiff is barred by the recovery which has taken place, than that the interests originally limited to Savile Henry Lumley and his issue male would be barred by a recovery suffered by a son of William Lumley. It is true that all interests which come after, or which operate so as to determine, the estate tail are barred by the recovery; but the interest here does not determine, it overreaches, the estate tail. It prevents that estate from coming into possession at all.

First, suppose that Frederick had taken no interest under the will except by the proviso, and that the limitation had been to John the father for life, remainder to trustees to preserve &c., remainder to John the son in tail, provided that if, in the life time of John the father,

the title shall descend upon him, the land shall immediately go over to Frederick; and suppose John the father to have conveyed to a tenant to the præcipe, for the joint lives of himself and such tenant, and John the son to have suffered a recovery and to have been vouched. Then the proviso would not have been barred, because the recovery could affect only interests expectant upon the estate tail of John the son. The principle may be illustrated as follows. (1.) Suppose land limited to A. in tail, provided that, if a tree fall, it shall go to B. in fee; this is the same as if the limitation were to A. in tail so long as the tree stands, and, when it falls, to B. in fee. The limitation to B. is expectant upon, and in order of limitation comes after, and operates by way of determining, the estate tail of A., and will be barred by a recovery suffered by A. This is in effect the case of Page v. Hayward (a). (2.) Suppose land limited to A. for life, remainder to B. in tail, provided that, if a tree fall, the land shall remain to C. in fee, but subject always to A.'s life estate. This is the same as if the limitation were to A. for life, and, after his decease, to B. in tail, so long as a tree stands, and, when the tree falls, to C. in fee, subject to A.'s life estate. Here again C.'s interest is expectant upon the determination of B.'s estate, and comes after it in order of limitation; and B. may bar it by a recovery. This is in effect the case of Pullen v. Ready (b). (3.) But suppose land limited to A. for life, remainder to B. in tail, provided that, if a tree fall during A.'s life, the limitations shall all cease and the land remain to C. in fee; this is the same as if the limitation were to A. for life, so long as the tree stands, and, if the tree fall during the life of A., then to C. in fee, but, in default of the tree falling during the life of A., remainder to B. in tail. Here, if B., during A.'s life and while the tree stands, suffer a recovery, that does not bar the conditional limitation in favour of C., which is not, as in the former case, expectant upon the estate tail, but is antecedent to it in order of limitation. [Tindal C. J. You suppose the tenant for life to join in the recovery.] Of course, so far as is necessary to make a good tenant to the præcipe. Now this case is in effect the same with that originally supposed. — The effect of a recovery suffered by a tenant in tail has been considered as depending upon three different principles. In the first place, there is a supposed compensation by virtue of the voucher; that clearly does not apply to estates antecedent to the estate tail, and cannot bar such a proviso as this, the tenant for life and the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and the person who is to take under the proviso, not having been vouched over. In the second place, the recovery destroys the estate tail, and therefore destroys such estates as are mere remainders supported by the estate tail; and, according to the view taken by Serjeant Hill, in the notes printed in 1 Sanders on Uses (a), a conditional limitation is in the nature of a remainder. But the interest arising under this proviso is supported, not by the estate tail, but, so far as it is supported by any estate, by the life estate: and (whatever might have been the effect if the tenant for life and the trustees had been vouched over) it cannot be affected by the destruction of the estate tail. In the third place, the recovery extends and prolongs the estate tail into a fee, in one direction, being a continuance of the estate tail, according to Lord Hale's language in Benson v. Hodson (a). But it does not extend the estate tail backwards. The estate gained is derived wholly from the estate tail, as continued by the recovery: Martin dem. Tregonwell v. Strachan (b), Roe dem. Crow v. Baldwre (c), The Appeal of the Lord Derwentwater (d), Garth v. Cotton (e), Serjeant Williams's note to Carswell v. Vaughan (g). The note of Serjeant Hill printed in 1 Sanders on Uses (h) leads to the same result. Hence interests, which are subsequent to the estate tail, are held to be barred by the recovery of the tenant in tail; Lord Hale in Benson v. Hodson (i), Page v. Hayward (k), Gulliver dem. Corrie v. Ashby (l), Driver dem. Edgar v. Edgar (m), Pullen v. Ready (n). But, on the other hand, charges and other interests, which are paramount or antecedent to the estate tail, or which wholly over-ride it, are not barred; White v. West (o), Smith dem. Richards v. Clyfford (p), Eales v.

Conn (a), 1 Sanders on Uses (b), 2 Sugd. Pow. 573, Appendix No. (4.) (c), Butler's note to Co. Litt. 203 b., (not 1. sect. 4.) (d). Roper v. Hallifax (e) is a direct authority to the same effect. It has been attempted to distinguish that case from the present, on the ground that an appointee, who takes under a power, is in the same situation as if he had been named in the instrument creating the power. But the same is true of a party taking under this proviso, who may not have been mentioned by name in the will. When the event mentioned in the proviso occurs, or the power is executed, then, in each case, and upon the same principle, the interest takes effect exactly as if the party claiming under it had been designated by name in the original instrument. In support of the distinction, the difference between the decision in Ray v. Pung (g), on the one side, and those in Buckworth v. Thirkell (h) and Moody v. King (i), on the other, has been referred to. But, if those decisions are all good law, it is upon doctrines peculiar to the law of dower and curtesy. It is clear that there is no such distinction as that contended for. The same arguments will apply to a shifting use taking effect upon the occurrence of an event, as apply to an use taking effect upon the execution of a power. The nature of the event upon which the new use is to arise cannot vary the result. This is consistent with the view taken in 1 Sand. on Uses, p. 176, 7. (k). In the Appendix to 2 Sugden on Powers, No. 3. (l), it is demonstrated that the two cases of a power and a proviso stand on the same ground. The argument may be put thus. Suppose there were limitations to A. for life, remainder to B. for 1000 years on certain trusts, remainder to C. in tail: C.'s recovery here could clearly not bar the term. But, supposing the limitations were to A. for life, remainder to C. in tail, with power to B., during A.'s life, to create a term of 1000 years, then also, upon the authority of Roper v. Hallifax (a), C.'s recovery could not bar the term created by the execution of B.'s power. But how could the result be different, if, instead of an absolute remainder or a power of appointment, the limitation were that, if A. had younger children during his life, the term of 1000 years should arise, or that, in the same case, an estate tail should arise? The rule must be general as to all estates antecedent to the estate tail. It is clear, therefore, that, on the hypothesis of Frederick taking no interest except by the proviso, and the limitation being annexed only to the life estate of John the father, the recovery could not have barred the proviso.

Secondly, suppose Frederick still to take no interest except by the proviso, but to have contingent interests under two separate provisos. Thus, suppose the limitations to be to John the father for life, remainder to John the son in tail, provided that, if John the father become earl, the land shall go to Frederick, and, also, provided that, if John the son become earl, the land shall go to Frederick. Then the first proviso clearly cannot be affected by the existence of the second; and, therefore, a recovery by John the son, though it would bar the second proviso, would not bar the first.

SCARBOROUGH
against

Thirdly, instead of the case last put, let the two separate provisos, there supposed, be supposed to be incorporated into one. Then the result would clearly be the same. The proviso would still be taken divisibly, as in Boyce v. Hanning (a). [Parke B. Does not the proviso in the present case operate differently in the two events? In the one, it carries the land to a brother of the tenant for life; and, in the other, it is not to carry the land to the brother of the tenant for life so long as such tenant for life has issue male.] That difference makes it the easier to take the proviso divisibly. At least it does not prejudice the argument. In each case the proviso is to carry the land to the person next in remainder after failure of issue male of the person who shall become earl; and, in each case, Frederick here answers that description.

Fourthly, the case actually before the Court differs from the supposition last made in the circumstance only that the proviso, instead of giving the estate over to a person not named in the previous limitations, gives it to a branch of the family taking also interests in remainder. But the operation of the proviso cannot be different in the two cases of an interest being conferred on a new party, and on a party taking also an interest by force of another clause of the will. In each case new uses are created. Had a fresh family been substituted in every case of the earldom descending upon the party in possession of the land, it will not be disputed that the uses so coming into operation would have been new uses. What difference can it make, that the party to be benefited by the proviso happened to have an interest under the original limitations? There is no legal objection to the same party claiming by distinct interests. An instance of this occurred in Goodtitle lessee of Vincent v. White (a). In that case the party was held to have at once two distinct fees simple, which is as strong a case as can be imagined. If the testator had here said expressly that new uses should arise on every descent of the title, there could have been no objection. Where a power is given to revoke uses and create new, a series of new uses arises as often as the power is executed. Suppose a different condition had been annexed to each estate, there could then be no doubt that the uses would be distinct: what difference can it make, whether the nature of the condition be the same or not? [Parke B. What are the new uses which arose when the title descended upon Richard, and John the father took the estates?] There arose a series of new uses exactly similar to those limited in the earlier part of the will; and so whenever the title descended upon a tenant for life in possession. There is no reason that there should not be a divesting of existing uses and a reversioning of new uses similar to those divested, in infinitum. It has been suggested that there are no new uses, and that the words of cesser are the only operative words: but the mere extinction of the estates determined by the clause of cesser would not have effectuated the intention of the deviser. For, if the estate of John the father simply ceased (which is all that the clause of cesser directs), if any estate in remainder came into possession, it would be the estate of John the son, not of Frederick. For that reason the words of gift are added. The lessor of the plaintiff therefore necessarily claims by the gift over, not merely by the cesser. [Alderson B. If the descent of the title had occurred after the remainder in tail had come into possession, the words "the estate shall cease" would effect the intention, for it would put an end to the estate tail.] It is sufficient for the present argument to shew that, in the event which has happened, that of the earldom descending on a tenant for life, the mere words of cesser cannot effect the intention. The present case is not governed by the decisions and dicta in Newis v. Lark (a), The Lady Anne Fry's Case (b), Page v. Hayward (c), Andrews dem. Jones v. Fulham (d), Avelyn v. Ward (e), Gulliver dem. Corrie v. Ashby (g), and pl. 9. in 18 Viner's Abridgment, 394, Remainder (G.), where, upon the cesser of the previous estate, no intermediate interest was passed over. It is said that the words of the proviso respecting the taking of the name and arms furnish no argument for the plaintiff below, because, having regard to the language of the name and arms clause, these words are in any point of view surplusage. This may be admitted; yet the insertion of the words shews that the deviser contemplated that new uses were to arise, and, however superfluously, provided for such an event. — It appears to be suggested, on the authority of Purfroy v. Rogers (h), Carwardine v. Carwardine (i), and Sugden's note to Gilbert on Uses, 171, that the interest under the proviso must be construed as a contingent remainder. The rule furnished by those authorities is that, where the question is between an executory devise and a contingent remainder, the Courts lean to the latter. But how does this rule apply here? or how is it to be made available against the plaintiff below? Supposing this a contingent remainder, the defendant below would not be benefited by such a construction; for it would be a remainder expectant upon the life estate and that of the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and therefore would not be destroyed by the recovery which has been suffered. But it is clear that this proviso cannot create a remainder, because the interest created by it does not await the determination of the first estate by the nature of the original limitation of that estate. Fearne, Cont. Rem. p. 13., says that the remainder is the remnant expectant on the particular estate, the whole fee not having been limited in the first instance; and he adds, p. 14., "The true point of distinction, as take it, between such conditional limitations over as are, and such as are not remainders, in the strict sense of that word, lies here; the former are limited to commence where the first estate is, by the very nature and extent of its original limitation, to expire or determine; whereas the latter are limited so as to be independent of the measure or extent originally given to the first estate, and to take effect in possession, upon an event which may happen before the regular determination, to which that first estate is liable from the nature of its original limitation, and so as to rescind it." So that it is clear, upon first principles, that the estate arising under the proviso in defeazance of the estate of John the father is not a remainder.

remainder. Driver dem. Frank v. Frank (a) was cited to shew that this, if possible, must be construed to be a vested remainder; and reliance was placed on Newis v. Lark (b), The Lady Anne Fry's Case (c), Page v. Hayward (d), Andrews dem. Jones v. Fulham (e), as shewing that the proviso and the prior limitations may be incorporated, so as to give effect to all the limitations as remainders, and make the limitation to the lessor of the plaintiff take effect as a vested remainder. But the answer is, that the proviso and limitations cannot here be so moulded in the form of remainders as to give effect to all the different interests as vested remainders. The estate of John the son, if the proviso and limitations were incorporated, would be contingent upon the event of his father dying before the earldom descended to him (g). Now a party having only a contingent remainder cannot bar by a recovery. And the recovery therefore would, upon that construction, be ineffectual. In Newis v. Lark (b), and the other cases relied on, the circumstance that, upon the cesser of the previous estate, no intermediate interest was passed over, made the suggested mode of construction admissible without considering any remainder as contingent. [Parke B. Suppose the proviso had said in express words that, if the earldom descended on John the father, the limitations to him and his issue should be struck out of the will?] That is very different from the clause as it is actually framed. But, supposing it so expressed, and accompanied with a gift over, express or implied, the lessor of the plaintiff below would still claim under a shifting use, paramount and antecedent to the remainder in tail of John the son; and this; according to Roper v. Hallifax (a), would not be barred. But, if there were merely such a clause of cesser, and no gift over, express or implied, the intention of the testator could not be accomplished; for no one except the testator's heir at law could then take advantage of the cesser.

Sir W. W. Follett in reply.

I. As to the deeds of 1817. It is said that the lessor of the plaintiff below is not precluded from maintaining this action by his covenant, because John Doe has not covenanted. But the Court will look to the real party. A tenant, who is defendant in ejectment brought on the demise of his landlord, cannot dispute his landlord's title. So, in Doe dem. Morris v. Rosser (b), where the lessor of the plaintiff and the defendant had submitted to arbitration, the award was held conclusive evidence between them. In Thorpe v. Eyre (c), where that case was cited, it was indeed held that an award did not actually transfer the property; but not that it did not bind the party to the arbitration. Here the deeds are at least as conclusive as the submission to the award. Again, as to the question whether the deeds would convey the possibility, at law. It is argued that a lease and release cannot have that effect. Perhaps that form of conveyance is not the most convenient. But, if the assignment be not impossible, the Court will look to the intention, and allow the lease and release to have the effect proposed; Doe dem. Were v. Cole (a), Doe dem. Milbourne v. Simpson (b). The passage referred to from Sheppard's Touchstone, 431, was cited, but without success, in Jones v. Roe, lessee of Perry (c). And formerly such interests were considered not merely as incapable of assignment, but as neither descendible nor devisable. Now they clearly may descend or be devised: and therefore it is not easy to say why they should not be held to be assignable also (d). In 2 Preston on Conveyancing, 270, it is certainly said that they are not assignable; but the point is spoken of as one on which the profession are not unanimous. It was argued that the marginal note in Doe dem. Shaw v. Steward (e) goes too far, for that the case merely shews the interest to be at least assignable in equity. But the successful argument in that case was directed to establish that it was assignable at law; and the judgment is to the same effect, the question discussed being, whether there was any equity in the wife to bar the assignee's title under the husband. The prevailing opinion in the profession, on this point, certainly is in favour of the defendant in error; but no authority has been found which is conclusive.

II. As to the question whether the proviso can operate so as to shift the estates more than once. On the general principle of not allowing estates to be divested without express words, Doe dem. Luscombe v.

Yeates (a) is not distinguishable. The expressions cited from the will, on the other side, may be consistent with the construction that the clause is to operate toties quoties, but the question is whether they necessarily require that construction. The circumstance that the proviso directs the estates to go to "person and persons" proves nothing: and, though the title is spoken of as descending to "him or them," yet these words have no antecedent; and they seem to mean no more than "any of them," the phrase used before. The proper form for a clause which is to operate more than once may be found in Fazakerly v. Ford (b). Stanley v. Stanley (c) is an instance of the strictness with which the words of such provisions are construed. And it may be also remarked that, neither in that case, nor in Doe dem. Heneage v. Heneage (d), was it attempted to shew that new estates were created by the proviso: the interests were treated merely as remainders.

III. As to the effect of the recovery, the plaintiff in error contends that the defendant takes merely a vested remainder, expectant on the determination (either by natural expiration, or the descent of the earldom) of the estates of John the father and John the son. On the other side, it is said that he takes two estates; but, according to the construction attempted, he must take many more; he must have a vested remainder, together with a possibility upon John the father becoming earl; then another vested remainder, together with a possibility upon John the son becoming earl; and, upon younger sons of John coming into possession, other pairs of estates of the same kind, toties quoties.

It has not been shewn how, if that were possible, the proviso is to be attached to the new use. Such a complicated method of reading the limitations will not be adopted, if any more simple can be found. The principal reason suggested in the judgment below for rejecting the more simple construction seems to be that, if it were adopted, the testator's intent would be defeated by the recovery, which, for the reasons before given, is not an admissible argument. In Fearne's Contingent Remainders, p. 257., it is said that the power to suffer a recovery is inseparably attached to every estate tail. [Alderson B. The rule in Shelley's Case (a) ordinarily tends to defeat the intention, in the manner pointed out by Lord Eldon in Jesson v. Doe dem. Wright (b)]. Unless the liability to a recovery is to be taken into consideration, the intent may be carried into effect by construing the limitation as either a shifting use or a vested remainder, and, on the authorities cited, the Court will prefer the latter. It is said that the rule of preference applies only where the question is between an executory devise and a contingent remainder; but the operation of an executory devise and a shifting use is the same. To the authorities before cited, on this point, may be added Fearne, Cont. Rem. p. 266. (citing Goodtitle lessee of Winckles v. Billington (c)), and Doe dem. Harris v. Howell (d).

It has been argued that the clause of cesser is insufficient to effectuate the testator's intention; but it is also urged on the other side that the estates of both John the father and John the son are to cease upon John the father becoming earl. Then the interest of the brother of John the father comes into possession: which shews that it is impossible to distinguish this case from Newis v. Lark (a) and The Lady Anne Fry's Case (b) on the ground suggested; for, in each case, the party taking upon the cesser is the party whose interest is next in remainder to that which is to cease. Those decisions are therefore conclusive authorities, that, in a devise (for it may possibly be otherwise in a deed, at least in one operating purely at common law), interests like that of the lessor of the plaintiff below must be construed as remainders expectant on the determination of the subsisting estate.

The only authority which really is in favour of the plaintiff below, is the passage in Fearne, Cont. Rem. p. 14. (antè, p. 929.). But this doctrine cannot be supported. What is meant by "originally given," and "original limitation?" No one limitation is more original than another in the same instrument. The whole must be taken together as making up the disposition of the estate, and incorporated, as in Newis v. Lark (a) and The Lady Anne Fry's Case (b). When they are so incorporated, the resulting limitation is a remainder, as appears by those cases, and according to Fearne's own view. In Butler's note (h) on Fearne, p. 10., the distinction is spoken of as artificial, but is admitted; but, in the same writer's note (1) at Co. Litt. 203 b. (III.), the language is more doubtful. In Douglas's note [1] to Goodtitle, lessee of Winckles, v. Billington (c), the doctrine is disputed. Fearne has offered an answer to the objections, (p. 15. and p. 267.); but he cites no authority except Cogan v. Cogan (a). Supposing that case to be good law (which is doubtful), it may be distinguished from the present: it was a deed inter vivos, not a will: and it was a case of a strict common law condition, so that the life estate and remainder would be destroyed together. And the party to take under the limitation over was to take only on the particular event, and not in any event: there was no remainder to be accelerated. That Fearne himself had not taken a very accurate view of the distinction, appears from an inconsistency which occurs soon afterwards. At p. 18, he has the following passage: — “ Suppose an estate devised to A. for life, remainder to B. in fee, provided that if A. should refuse to take the testator’s surname within a short limited time, or certain lands should descend to him, then his estate should cease, and the lands go immediately to the remainder-man or his heirs — or, a limitation to A. for life, remainder to B. for life, remainder to C. and the heirs of his body, remainder to D. in fee, with a proviso that upon the accruer of certain other lands to A. or to B. or to C., or his issue, the estate limited by the will to the person to whom such other lands should so accrue, should thereupon cease, and the devised lands go immediately to the next in remainder, according to the will; or, suppose a devise to A. for life, provided that if the testator’s son should return from the East Indies within two years after the testator’s death, the estate of A. should thereupon cease, and the lands should go to the son for life, or in tail, would such limitations be contingent remainders barrable by the first tenant for life as such? If so, the tenant for life would have nothing more to do than to make a demise for 99 years in trust for himself, and then levy a fine, or make a feoffment, to get entirely rid of them. But if the decided case (a) I have referred to be law, the limitations I have put are conditional limitations, which, though void in conveyances at common law, are admitted to operate in a will as executory devises, and consequently are not barrable as contingent remainders." Now, in the two first cases, the limitations, if they are remainders (which they are), are vested, for they take effect sooner or later in every event. As to this, the test of contingency given by Fearne at p. 19. is conclusive. And, besides this, the supposed objection arising from the power of the tenant for life to get rid of the limitations is invalid; for it cannot be disputed that they are barrable by some recovery. Fearne's doctrine cannot therefore be supported. It is impugned in some remarks of the late Mr. Bradley, printed in Practical Points, or Maxims in Conveyancing, by Charles Barton, jun., p. 195. (and in Atkinson's Practical Points in Conveyancing, p. 82.). "When two family estates are settled in such a manner as that by a probable event both may unite in the same person, it is usual to insert a proviso in the latter settlement, that if that event should happen the estate for life or in tail of that person in the premises comprised in the latter settlement should cease and determine, and the next remainder come into possession. It was referred to Mr. Fearne to settle a proviso in a case so circumstanced: that gentleman, after much consideration, introduced his opinion by defining the nature of an executory devise, stating the rules which the law has established with respect to the execution and commencement of contingent estates, and by a strange misapplication of those rules to the case under consideration, which had nothing in it which bore the least resemblance to the estates defined, he concluded that the proviso should confine the happening of the contingency within the period of 21 years from the death of a person in being. One cannot but wonder at so great a mistake. By uniting in the same person the premises comprised in both settlements, a vested estate-tail, if such were his estate, would indeed determine, and the next in remainder come into possession; but clearly no new estate would arise or be created on that contingency; and whether the estate-tail should expire by the failure of issue, or should determine by the happening of the contingency, and whether within twenty or two hundred years, the effect and consequence would be the same, the next in remainder would come into possession; but in neither case would any new estate arise or come in esse; and the proviso leaving the happening of the contingency indefinitely in point of time, would be so far from tending to a perpetuity, that it would have quite a contrary tendency; for the estate of an infant tenant in tail might, by happening of the contingency, determine during his infancy, and the person next in remainder (being of full age) and tenant in tail, by suffering a common recovery, or being tenant in fee-simple, might by a common conveyance, or by his last will, dispose of the inheritance at his pleasure; and any tenant in tail in possession being of full age might at any period of time, by suffering a common recovery, bar that estate-tail, and all remainders over, in the same manner manner as if the proviso had not been inserted, and the proviso itself would cease for ever; but to make use of an argument in order to prove a point so clear, seems (in Mr. Bradley's opinion) to be no less absurd than it would be to attempt to prove by argument that two and two are equal to four; both the one and the other being self-evident truths."

It has been attempted to distinguish between a recovery suffered by a tenant in tail in possession, and one suffered by a remainder-man in tail with the concurrence of the tenant for life. Such a distinction is unimportant. All that is requisite is that there should be a vested estate tail, and a determination of that with the concurrence of the freeholder.

It is said that, if the proviso carried the estate over to a stranger, it would not create a remainder.* But the only difference would be that it would create a contingent remainder instead of a vested one. And this is shewn by the opinion of Serjeant Hill, printed in 1 Sanders on Uses, p. 436. (a).

It was attempted to divide the one interest of the lessor of the plaintiff below, taking effect at different times according to different events, into two, one to operate in one event, one in the other. For this there is no ground: and, in order to support such a view, it was necessary to insert a condition, not contained in the devise, that the event should happen in the life of John the father. In fact, there are numerous varieties of events which would change the time at which the interest came into possession; if John the father died without issue, Frederick would take on his death; so if John the son, or any younger brother of his, first died without issue. But this does not convert the remainder of Frederick into so many distinct remainders, each supported by different particular estates. Frederick could take nothing at all till, by some event or other, the estates of John the father and of all his issue were determined. And whenever and however they were determined, he was to take.

It was attempted to shew that, if Frederick's estate were construed as a remainder by incorporating together all the limitations, the estate of John the son would become contingent also. But that was made out by arbitrarily introducing, as a qualification of John the son's remainder, that it was to take effect only if the father died without being earl. But the limitation first gives an unqualified vested remainder; and then comes the proviso which is to be incorporated into the limitations, by the several interests lasting until the parties shall become earl. The limitations are to be blotted out on the event occurring, but to be in force till then (a).

It was asked, whether a recovery by a later remainder man in tail would bar the previous estates? It would bar the remainder, whether to accrue by failure of issue or descent of the title, of all parties subsequent in point of limitation to the party suffering it. Thus, a recovery by Savile Henry Lumley would bar all the interest of William Lumley. So here the recovery of John the son bars all the interest of Frederick.

As for the argument from the repetition of the direction respecting the name and arms, the contrary is to be inferred from that circumstance; for, if the testator had intended the proviso, which was to operate when the title descended, to be repeated also, he would have inserted a direction for one as well as the other.

(a) As to this point, see the papers sent in after the conclusion of the argument, post, p. 942.

It was asserted, in order to make the case of Roper v. Hallifax (a) applicable, first, that the proviso created new estates; secondly, that the proviso was annexed to the life estate of John, the father, separately; thirdly, that the new estates were interposed before the remainder in tail of John the son. But the proviso destroys the remainder in tail at the same time with the estate for life. It has not been shewn what is to become of the estate tail of John the son, upon the construction contended for on the other side. Then how can the proviso be confined to the life estate, or the interest arising under it be interposed between the two estates, which it destroys simultaneously? It was said that it did not destroy the remainder in tail, but only prevented its vesting in possession. But the remainder was actually vested; and the vested estate tail in remainder was defeated by the proviso at the same instant as the estate for life.

The argument against the applicability of Roper v. Hallifax (a) is not answered. It never was doubted that a proviso for a shifting use would have been barred in that case: the sketch of an argument, by Sir Edward Sugden, on that case, in 2 Sugd. on Powers (b), assumes this as clear from doubt. Suppose land were devised to such uses as A. shall appoint, and, in default of appointment, to B. in tail; or, suppose an estate given to A. in tail, with power to the executors to sell for payment of debts; could the tenant in tail bar that by recovery? According to the present notion, taking Roper v. Hallifax (a) to be law, he could not. Supposing there were a proviso to defeat the estate tail, there is no doubt a recovery would bar it.

The passage from 1 Sanders on Uses, 177 (b), is inaccurate. In the sentence preceding that, he says, that a collateral power “does not properly determine an estate, like a remainder.” A remainder does not determine the estate tail; and, in the case which he puts, D.’s estate could not be a remainder, because the whole fee was previously limited. Again, the life estate of A. is not affected by the proviso; so that the estate of D. would be expectant upon that of A.: whereas, here, the life estate and all the estates were to be determined together.

At the close of the argument, the Court desired that the counsel on each side would send in, in writing, a statement of the form in which they respectively considered that the limitations of the will should be moulded so as to shew the result of reading the proviso and original limitations as incorporated together, according to their opposite views. Subsequently, papers which were substantially the same as those hereafter numbered I. II. III. IV. V. were put in, in that order; the papers numbered I. III. V. by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, and those numbered II. and IV. by the counsel for the defendant in error.

(Plaintiff in

With reference to that part of the argument of the counsel for the plaintiff in error, in which he contended that the lessor of the original plaintiff took no interest but a remainder, he submits that,

Assuming that the proviso was to operate more than once, and that it avoided the estates tail of the sons of the tenant for life on whom the title fell, as well as the life estate, it should be read in one of the ways following:—

If the proviso be read separately, i. e. as a proviso of cesser, and not incorporated as part of each limitation, then, as declaring that, if the

(a) 8 Taunt. 845. Antè, p. 18.

(b) Antè, p. 26.

earldom should devolve upon any of the tenants for life, or on any of their sons, within the period prescribed, then, and so often as the same should happen, the estate of the person upon whom the title should for the time being devolve, and, if such person should be tenant for life, then also the estate limited to the trustees and their heirs during his life to preserve contingent remainders, and the estates tail of his sons, should cease, as if the person on whom the title should, for the time being, devolve were dead without issue male: Or,

If the proviso is supposed to be incorporated in each limitation as parts of its duration, then as follows: — To the use of Richard for life, or until he should become earl; with remainder to the use of trustees and their heirs during the life of Richard, or until he should become earl, in trust to preserve &c.; with remainder to the use of his first son and the heirs male of his body, so long as Richard or the son (during the period prescribed) should not be earl; with remainder to the use of the second son and the heirs male of his body in like manner, and so on to the other sons; and, on the failure of these limitations, to the use of John for life, or until he should become earl; and so on as in the preceding branch; and then to the use of Frederick, &c. in like manner.

II.

When the limitations and proviso are incorporated on the principle of Newis v. Lark (or Scolastica's Case), Plowd. 408., so as to give effect to the testator's objects in the way of remainder, the form which results will stand thus: —

To the use of John for life, until he shall become earl; and, after the determination of that estate by forfeiture or otherwise in his life time, before he shall become earl, to the use of the trustees and their heirs during his life until he shall become earl, in trust to preserve &c.; and, after the decease of John, if he shall die without becoming earl, to the use of his first son and the heirs male of his body, until such first son shall, during the prescribed period, become earl (and so on, to the second and other sons of John); and, after the failure or determination of the above limitations (whether by John's becoming earl, or by his death and the failure or determination of the estates of his sons), to the use of Frederick for life until he shall become earl; and, after the determination of that estate by forfeiture or otherwise in his life time, before he shall become earl, to the use of trustees (as before); and, after the decease of Frederick, if he should die without becoming earl, to the use of his first son and the heirs male of his body, until such first son shall (during the prescribed period) become earl (and so on, to the second and other sons of Frederick).

Here, Frederick the father takes a vested remainder; and the sons of John the father, and the sons of Frederick the father, take, on their respective births, contingent remainders of Fearne's first class; Cont. Rem. p. 5.

Or the result of incorporating the limitations might be worded thus:—

To the use of John for life, until he shall become earl; and, after the determination of that estate by forfeiture or otherwise in his life time, and whilst he shall not be earl, to the use of the trustees and their heirs during his life, or until he shall become earl, in trust to preserve &c.; and, after the decease of John or upon his becoming earl, to the use of his first son and the heirs male of his body, so long as John shall not be earl, or as such son (during the prescribed period) shall not be earl; and so on to the second and other sons of John; and, after the failure or determination of the above limitations, to the use of Frederick for life, or until he shall become earl: and so on as in the preceding branch.

In other words, and in effect:—

To the use of John for life, or until he shall become earl; and, after the determination of the estate of John, whether by his becoming earl or his death, to the use of the first son of John and the heirs male of his body, until the estate of John shall determine by his becoming earl, or until such first son shall become earl, &c.

Here also Frederick the father takes a vested remainder, and the sons of John the father, and the sons of Frederick the father, take on their respective births contingent remainders of Fearne's first class; Cont. Rem. p. 5.: for the remainders to the sons can take effect only if the father shall die without becoming earl; and the words "so long" &c., and "until," mean "unless," and provide in substance, not for determining the estate tail, but for its not taking effect; and mere words cannot make a remainder vested which is essentially contingent.

(Plaintiff in error.)

III.

It is a fallacy to consider a remainder to be contingent, merely because it may not vest in actual possession, or because both the remainder and the particular estate may possibly determine by the same event, they thus having some one common determinable quality.

The following are instances of vested remainders, where the particular estates and the remainders have some one common determinable quality, and where it is quite uncertain whether the remainders will ever take effect in possession.

1. The estate commonly in use for preserving contingent remainders, and which, in fact, is one of the limitations in the principal case. The estate is limited to a man for his life, with remainder (that is, after the determination of the estate by any means in his lifetime) to trustees and their heirs during his life. Here the remainder could not, in its nature, in whatever words it might be expressed, take effect after the natural expiration of the prior particular estate, since both the estates must determine on the decease of the same tenant for life. If the first estate should not end by forfeiture or surrender, they will both end at the same moment; and the second can never take effect in possession: and yet this has been held held to be a vested remainder, and is indeed so considered in every day's practice; Duncomb v. Duncomb, 3 Lev. 437; Parkhurst v. Smith, lessee of Dormer, Willes, 327.; Fearne's Cont. Rem. 218.; Co. Lit. 265 a., note (2.); and various other books.

2. The similar mode of limitation used in every day's practice for barring dower, and which appears from Fearne, 347. (note), to have been suggested by the above cited case of Duncomb v. Duncomb, 3 Lev. 437.

3. An estate is limited to A. and his heirs, for the joint lives of Y. and Z., with remainder to B. and his heirs for the life of Y. This is rather the converse case; for here the remainder may by possibility take effect after the natural expiration of the particular estate, as if Z. should die before Y. But still this is quite uncertain. For, if Y. should die before Z., the remainder over could never so take effect. The two limitations would end together.

4. An estate limited to A. for life, so long as a tree shall stand, remainder to B. in tail, so long as the same tree shall stand. Here the fall of the tree, supposing it to fall during A.'s life, and before a surrender &c. of the life estate, would determine both estates.

Various other instances might be put; but these are quite sufficient to shew the fallacy of the observations on the other side. The true rule is that, if a remainder be limited to a person ascertained and in esse, and be to take effect in every possible case consistently with its duration, the remainder is vested. Thus, in the first and second cases, though the remainder, as it is usually expressed, sounds contingently, since it is only to take effect on the life estate determining in the lifetime of the tenant for life, still the remainder is to take effect in every case in which it possibly can, consistently with its duration. It is therefore a vested remainder. To deny it to be such, would be to hold that, though, subject to the life interest, an ulterior interest still remains, which may by possibility take effect during the life by forfeiture, &c., still that interest could not be made certainly to vest in any one without giving him an estate which might endure beyond the life; and for this there is no reason. On the contrary, there is every reason in law for allowing persons to parcel out the various interests in any way they see fit, and for making them vested, rather than contingent. The third instance may be tried by the same test. And so may the fourth instance, which is still more analogous to the principal case.

Suppose, in the principal case, the testator had expressly said that, though his intention was that the estate of each tenant for life should determine on his becoming earl, still the inheritance in remainder should nevertheless vest in the sons of a tenant for life on their births, and remain so vested till the earldom should devolve on the tenant for life. Is there any rule of law to prevent the accomplishment of such an intention? Is there any rule of law which peremptorily says that, because that estate of inheritance may by possibility determine by the same event which determines the estate for life, therefore it must necessarily remain in contingency, tingency, and the inheritance by consequence descend to the testator's heir at law until a tenant for life shall die, notwithstanding the existence of sons? The rule of law as to vesting estates is quite the reverse. And, as to the testator's intention, he has in fact declared this: for he first limits the estates in words which would clearly give vested estates; and the proviso merely professes to determine these, and not to create any precedent condition as to their vesting.

The observation on the other side, that the remainders to the sons can take effect only if the father shall die without becoming earl, is erroneous, and founded on a sort of popular, and not a legal, view of the nature of a remainder. In the common case of a remainder to A. for life, and, after his decease, to B. for life, it would be popularly said that B. could not take unless he should survive A.; but this would be very inaccurate in a legal point of view, since B. might, by the surrender or forfeiture of A.'s life estate, take, although he should not survive A. So, in the present case, the son of a tenant for life may well take a vested interest immediately on his birth; and that interest might take effect in possession before it should be determined whether the father might become earl or not. Thus, on the father and son suffering a recovery, they would have acquired the whole interest in the estate, and might require the trustees to surrender their intermediate estate.

It is further submitted that the other side have no warrant for introducing the words "if," "unless," &c. into the limitations, either expressly or by construction. The will commences by giving vested estates; and the only words of contingency introduced in the proviso are those of a determining quality.

It should, perhaps, be mentioned that the second form submitted by the other side varies in words from the form submitted by the plaintiff in error, and thus gives the limitations the appearance of a repugnancy, as in the case of Parkhurst v. Smith, lessee of Dormer, Willes, 327, above cited, the remainder being literally limited, upon the tenant for life becoming earl, to his son until the tenant for life should become earl (that is, the same event), &c. The words, if introduced, would, it is submitted, do no harm, any more than in the cited case, even if they should be held to go farther than pointing out the order of time in which the various limitations determine and take effect, &c. But, in fact, the words are not in the will; and if, as the plaintiff in error contends, proper vested remainders were created, he must have a right to mould the limitations in the way most proper to give effect to the intention; as in the form suggested by him, by the words "with remainder" &c., or in other words to the same effect. The testator may be considered as in effect having said thus: "I give to Richard for life, or until he shall become earl, and, as to what remains, or subject thereto (that is with remainder), to the trustees and their heirs during his life, or until he shall become earl, in trust to preserve, &c.; and, as to what remains, or subject thereto, to his first son and the heirs male of his body until Richard or the son shall shall become earl, &c." Here there is no contingency. The son, on his birth, supposing Richard not to have previously become earl, takes a vested estate tail, which may endure for ever; though indeed it is subject to be determined (unless prevented by a recovery) by the father or son becoming earl. This vested estate tail may be aliened, charged, &c., and by virtue of it the son may accept a surrender of the prior estate, or take advantage of any forfeiture. The other side have not explained how, if the estate of the son is contingent, the trustees' estate is not also contingent. If the limitation to the son is to be read so as to take effect after the determination of the father's estate by his becoming earl, in which event in fact it is not to take effect at all, why is not the limitation to the trustees to be read in the same way? In the paraphrase of the limitations suggested on the other side, they in fact drop all reference to the estate of the trustees. In this paraphrase, too, and in the observations accompanying it, they wholly leave out of view the fact that, on a limitation to A. for life, and, after his decease, to B., B. has a present and immediate interest during A.'s life.

It should be noticed, too, that the observations on the other side are altogether opposed to the argument on that side in the court below. In that argument, on the point of remainders, there was no suggestion or hint that, if this construction were adopted, the estates of the sons would be contingent. On the contrary, their argument below (antè, 36; 4 N. M. 752.) proceeded upon a totally different assumption; since they admitted that the recovery had barred the estate of the lessor of the original plaintiff in one point of view, though not in another point of view. Whereas, if the remainder of the plaintiff in error was, as now suggested, a contingent one, as depending upon the fact of his father not becoming earl, the recovery was clearly altogether void, since, in the event which happened of the devolution of the earldom on his father, the remainder of the plaintiff in error never took effect at all.

(1.) It is argued that the only grounds on which the remainders to the sons of John the father, according to the method of moulding the limitations suggested on the part of the defendant in error, can be considered as contingent, is, either that they may never vest in actual possession, or that both the remainder and the particular estate may possibly determine by the same event. This is incorrect. Clearly, neither of these circumstances will make a remainder contingent. But the remainder to each son of John the father will be contingent for this reason, that the particular estate limited to John the father is originally so limited that it may expire on more than one event, i. e., either by his death or the descent of the title; and the remainder limited upon it is to come into enjoyment, if the particular estate determine on one of the events, vis., the death of the father, and is not to come into enjoyment if the particular estate determine on the other event, viz., the descent of the title. So that the right of enjoyment is to accrue on an event which is originally dubious and uncertain, such uncertainty being independent of the period for which the remainder may endure in the case in which it can come into actual enjoyment. The remainder, therefore, has not originally a capacity of taking effect on every determination of the particular estate. It originally depends on a contingent determination of the particular estate, and is indisputably a contingent remainder of Fearne's first class. (Cont. Rem. p. 5.).

(2.) Instances have been put by the other side to establish the position, that a remainder may be vested, though it may never vest in actual possession, or though it may determine before or contemporaneously with the particular estate; a position which needed no proof. But those instances have no similarity to the present case. They are all cases in which the remainder may fail to come into possession, not by reason of its original incapacity of taking effect in enjoyment upon every determination of the particular estate, but merely by reason of the period, for which the remainder was to continue after any possible determination of the particular estate, having run out.

Thus, in the first example put, which is the common case of an estate to A. for life, and, after the determination of that estate by forfeiture or otherwise in his lifetime, to trustees and their heirs during his life, in trust &c.: here, there is an event, viz. the death of A. without a determination of his estate by forfeiture or otherwise during his life, in which the estate of the trustees will not come into enjoyment: but the only reason why it will not do so is that, at the happening of such event, the period for which the estate of the trustee was to continue, in the case in which it might come into enjoyment, has run out and is expired. The second example put, which is that of the trustee to bar dower, is identical with the first. So, in the third example, viz. a limitation to A. and his heirs for the joint lives of Y. and Z., with remainder to B. and his heirs for the life of Y. If Y. dies in the lifetime of Z., the remainder to B. during the life of Y. does not take effect. But this is merely because the period for which B.'s estate was to continue, in the case in which it might come into enjoyment, has expired. And so, in the fourth example, where an estate is supposed to be limited to A. for life so long as a tree shall stand, remainder to B. in tail so long as the same tree shall stand; if the tree fall during the life of A., the estate tail of B. will not come into enjoyment; but this is merely because the period, during which B.'s estate was to continue, in the case in which it might come into enjoyment, has run out.

(3.) To contrast these examples with the present case: — Suppose that the fall of a tree were, in the fourth example, confined to A.'s life, which will make that example identical with the principal case; the other side would then propose to frame the limitations thus: to A. for life, until a tree shall fall during his, A.'s, life, remainder to B. in tail until the same tree shall fall during A.'s life. Now here A.'s estate is determinable on two events; viz. first, his death; secondly, the fall of the tree: and, on the first event, viz. on the death, it is to vest in possession in B. in tail absolutely; but, on the second event, viz. the fall of the tree during A.'s life, it is not to go to B. at all. B.'s estate, therefore, is expectant upon a contingent determination only of A.'s estate, not upon any determination of it; and it is clearly contingent. For the reason why, in the event of the tree falling in the life of A., the estate of B. will not come into enjoyment, is not (as in the examples put by the other side) because the period, during which the estate was to continue, in the case in which it might come into enjoyment, has run out; for, B. or issue of B. being alive, such would not be the case: but because (without regard to that period) the estate of B., as originally limited, was not to take effect if the tree should fall during A.'s life. This feature forms the essential distinction between the principal case and the examples proposed on the other side.

It may perhaps be said that, in order to put accurately the case last considered, notice ought to be taken of the possibility of A.'s estate determining by forfeiture; and that this ought to be regarded as one mode of determination on which the remainder is expectant. If this were so, it would not alter the result. The only difference would then be, that the remainder would be regarded as expectant on two out of three possible determinations of the particular estate, instead of being expectant on one out of two such possible determinations. But, in fact, the case as first put is accurately propounded; for B.'s remainder, not being in other respects (i. e. independently of forfeiture) a vested remainder, he would not be entitled to enter in case of forfeiture; and therefore his remainder is not expectant on that event.

(4.) The general rule is alleged by the other side to be that, if a remainder be limited to a person ascertained and in esse, and be to take effect in every possible case consistently with its duration, the remainder is vested. A more exact statement of the rule would be that, if a remainder be limited to a person ascertained and in esse, and be to take effect in every possible case, other than the effluxion of the period for which the remainder can in any event continue in enjoyment, the remainder is vested.

(5.) If the other side were right in their position, that, in moulding the limitations so as to embrace the objects of the shifting clause by way of remainder, the remainders to the sons of John the father might be made vested remainders, the effect would be that Fearne's first class of contingent remainders might, by a slight alteration in form, be abolished. Take an example of this class, put by Mr. Butler in his note to Fearne, Cont. Rem. p. 6. note (d). If an estate be limited to the use of A. till B. returns from Rome, and, on B.'s return, to the use of C. in fee, "A. takes an estate which will expire on his own decease, or B.'s return from Rome, which shall first happen. In the case proposed, it is intended, that if A.'s estate expire by B.'s return from Rome, C. shall have the land, but that if A.'s estate expire by his decease, C. shall not have the land. Now, while both A.'s life and B.'s residence at Rome continue, it is uncertain in which of these modes the preceding estate will expire; the remainder, therefore, evidently depends on a contingent determination of the preceding estate." But, according to the defendant's system, this limitation might be moulded thus:—to A. for life, or till B. returns from Rome, remainder (i. e. after the death of A. or the return of B. from Rome) to C. in tail until A. dies without B. returning from Rome; which produces the same result exactly as the former limitation. But then, as the other side say, the remainder of C., by this change in the words, will be altered from a contingent into a vested remainder.

So, again (see Fearne's Cont. Rem. p. 5.); if an estate is limited to the use of A. in tail, until he A. shall do a certain act, and, after such act done by A., to the use of B. in tail; this, upon the system suggested, might be moulded thus:—to the use of A. in tail, or until he A. shall do a certain act, remainder (i. e. after the death of A. without issue or his doing the act) to B. in tail until A. shall die without having done the act; which gives the same result as the former limitation: and then, according to the proposed system, the remainder to B. would be altered from a contingent into a vested remainder.

Further, there is no reason why this should not be extended, and made efficacious for reducing into vested remainders many (perhaps, with ingenuity, all) other classes of contingent remainders, where the person to take is ascertained. For, in the common case of a limitation to the use of A. for life, and, if B. survive A., then to B. in tail (which is of course a contingent remainder), the limitation might be moulded thus:—"to the use of A. for life, remainder to B. in tail until B. dies in the lifetime of A.;" and then the estate of B. would be a vested remainder. In all the cases put, an estate is limited from the time of an event happening until the same event shall happen.

(6.) The fallacy of the system is that it arbitrarily converts a remainder, which is essentially dependent upon an uncertain event, into a remainder merely determinable upon such event.

(7.) With reference to the principal case, the true view of the matter is, that indisputably the testator's intention was that, upon the determination of John the father's estate, the inheritance should devolve in different ways, according to different events. In one event, that is, if John the father did not become earl, it was to go to his son. In the other event, that is, if John the father did become earl, it was to devolve on the lessor of the plaintiff. There were, therefore, two separate ways in which the inheritance was to devolve immediately after the determination of John the father's estate: and this circumstance is of itself conclusive that the estates of inheritance to be conferred by the two courses of devolution could not be simultaneously vested. If the proviso is held to operate according to its natural purport, by way of shifting use or executory devise, the estate in respect of which the lessor of the plaintiff now claims was the contingent estate. If the will could be moulded as required by the other side, the estate of John the son would be contingent, and was so at the time of suffering the recovery.

(8.) It has been asked, "Suppose, in the principal case, the testator had expressly said that, though his intention was that the estate of each tenant for life should determine on his becoming earl, still the inheritance in remainder should nevertheless vest in the sons of a tenant for life on their births, and remain so vested till the earldom should devolve on the tenant for life. Is there any rule of law to prevent the accomplishment of such an intention?" The answer is, that no doubt the testator's intention, so expressed, could be accomplished; but that the object could only be effectuated (as it is in the principal case) by way of shifting use. It certainly could not be effectuated by way of vested remainders. If it could, why might not a similar direction be given in every case of a contingent remainder limited to a person in esse?

(9.) Again, with reference to the example which has been put, of a limitation to A. for life, and, after his decease, to B. for life: this has no application to the point in dispute. It is merely the case of an estate for the two lives of A. and B., carved into a particular estate to A. and a remainder to B.; and, if B. dies in the life of A., the reason why his remainder does not come into enjoyment, is, that the period for which such remainder would endure, in the case in which it could come into enjoyment, has expired.

(10.) Again, the case which has been put of a recovery being suffered by the father and son proves nothing. It involves a petitio principii: it assumes that the remainder, in the principal case, would, in the proposed mode of moulding the limitations, be vested, and argues as to what results may follow. But if (as is in fact the case) the remainder would be contingent, the recovery would be inoperative.

(11.) Again, it has been said that there is no warrant for introducing the words "if," "unless," &c., into the limitations, either expressly or by construction. This observation proceeds on a misapprehension of the argument. The argument is, not that the words "if," "unless," &c. ought to be introduced, but that, if the will were to be moulded so as to embrace the shifting clause in the way of remainders, the estates to the sons of John would necessarily be contingent remainders. And the words "if" or "unless" are used only to shew what would be the effect of thus moulding the will. They are used, in fact, only for the purpose of pointing out that, in the form submitted on the other side, the word "until" means "unless."

(12.) It has been urged that the form submitted on the part of the defendant in error varies in words from the form submitted on the part of the plaintiff in error, and gives the limitations the appearance of a repugnancy, which it is said does not exist. Now, as the form of words used can have no influence on the substantial question between the parties, and as both the proposed forms produce the same results, it may be conceded that, if the form submitted by the plaintiff in error would make the remainders to the sons of John the father vested, the form submitted by the lessor of the plaintiff would have the same effect. But then the converse of this concession will also be true; that is, if the remainder would be contingent under the latter form, it will equally be so under the former; the reasons that apply to the one, equally apply to the other.

In truth, the only difference between the forms is that, in the form suggested for the defendant in error, the words introductory of the remainders are (according to the uniform practice in framing formal instruments, and according to the form of Sir George Savile's will) set out at length; and that, in the form suggested for the plaintiff in error, the effect only is given thus, "with remainder," which is the form used in abstracts, and sometimes, for the sake of shortness, in wills. The use of the latter form renders the repugnancy of the limitations less apparent; but the effect is the same in both.

It is further to be observed that, according to the proper and usual form of limiting remainders, the only event expressed in the introductory words is that in which the remainder is to vest in enjoyment. It would be absurd, in the case of the trustees to preserve &c., to frame the limitations as follows:—"to A. for life, and, after the determination of that estate by any means (i. e. either by the death of A., or by forfeiture, or otherwise, in his life time), to B. and his heirs until the death of A.;" and the limitation is never so framed. And so, in the fourth example put by the plaintiff in error, it would be equally absurd to frame the limitations as follows:—"to A. for life, so long as a tree shall stand, and, after the determination of that estate (i. e. either by the death of A., or by the falling of the tree), to B. in tail until the tree falls;" the tree, in the latter determination of A.'s estate, having already fallen. The proper mode would be thus:—"to A. for life, so long as a tree shall stand, and, after the determination of that estate by the death of A., to B. in tail so long as the same tree stands." Here all repugnancy is avoided. And it will be seen that the case of the trustees to preserve &c., and the fourth example, are in principle the same.

It may be worth noticing (in illustration of the principle that the form of words cannot influence the legal result) that, in the case of a limitation to A. for life, and, if B. survive him, to B. for life (which in form is contingent), the remainder to B. is still clearly vested.

(13.) A complaint is made that no explanation has been given how, if the estate of the son is contingent, the estate of the trustees to preserve is not also contingent. The answer to this has now been given. In the case of the son, if the particular estate determine by the descent of the title, title, he takes no estate in enjoyment; but this is, not because there is a failure of issue during the particular estate, but because the estate tail is prevented from taking effect by a contingency. In the case of the trustees, upon any determination of the particular estate, the estate of the trustees comes into possession, unless the period during which it is to continue, in any case in which it may so come into possession, has run out. The cases would be identical if, in the case of the remainder to the trustees, an exception were made of a particular mode in which the estate of the tenant for life might determine in his lifetime: thus — to A. for life, and, after the determination of that estate by any means during his life, to B. and his heirs during the life of A., or until A. commit a forfeiture by a particular act." Here the effect is the same as if it had been said, "after the determination of that estate, during the life of A., by any means except the act in question." And the remainder to the trustees would then clearly be contingent.

It is admitted, on the part of the defendant in error, that, in all the cases put for the plaintiff in error, the remainders would be vested. Unless, therefore, some solid distinction has been established between those cases and the present, the point at issue may be considered at an end. (Plaintiff in error.)

It is attempted (3.), with reference to the example put of the limitations depending upon the fall of a tree, to make a distinction on the fact, whether the estates are made determinable by the fall of the tree, generally, at any time, or only in the lifetime of the tenant for life; but no satisfactory reason is given for the distinction. It need not be disputed that, if the remainder were only to take effect if the tree were not to fall during the life of the tenant for life, then the remainder would be contingent; since to hold it vested, so as for the remainder-man to be capable of a surrender, or of taking advantage of a forfeiture during the lifetime of the tenant for life, and thus of enjoying the lands, though the tree might afterwards happen to fall during such lifetime, would be to give the party an estate directly contrary to the words of the settlement and the intention of the settlor: but still this is no reason for coming to the conclusion that the settlor might not, if he pleased, have given the remainder-man a vested remainder to endure until the tree should fall, and so as that the remainder-man might, in the case of a surrender or a forfeiture, actually enjoy the estate during that period and until the tree fell, whether the limitations were made to determine by the fall of the tree at any time, or during the life only of the tenant for life. It is clear, in both cases, that, if in fact the tree should fall during the life of the tenant for life and before a surrender &c., the remainder could never come into possession. In one case, as admitted, the remainder is a vested one. Why should it not be equally vested in the other case? The case put on the other side is in effect this: — "a limitation to A. for life, life, determinable if a certain tree shall fall, remainder to B. in tail, determinable if the tree shall fall during A.'s life." What is there here to render B.'s estate contingent, any more than if the words "during A.'s life" were omitted, or than if, after the words "during A.'s life," the words "or at any time after his decease" were added? He has, in fact, a more endurable estate; and why should it not be deemed a vested one, as well as in the other case?

Objections are made (4.) to the rule proposed for ascertaining what is a vested remainder; but no authority is given from the books, to which the rule would be inapplicable. Another rule is proposed on the other side, in the same language, save that for the words "consistently with its duration," the words "other than the effluxion of the period for which the remainder can in any event continue," are substituted. This substitution does not appear to render the rule more intelligible or consistent with the admissions made by the other side: and the rule originally proposed is simple, clearly intelligible, conformable to principle, and not impugned by any authority. At all events, without regard to the correctness of either rule, it is submitted that the examples put in the paper III., and not disputed on the other side, are not, with reference to the point under discussion, substantially to be distinguished from the principal case.

It is said (5.) that, if the view taken by the plaintiff in error be correct, Fearne's first class of contingent remainders, and possibly many other contingent remainders, might be made vested remainders by the alteration of a few words, or by construction. It would not be surprising that such contingent remainders as are not necessarily contingent (as those are where the parties are unborn, &c.) should, by the alteration of a few words, be rendered capable of being vested; since they are simply contingent because they are made to depend, by the will of the settlor, upon an uncertain event. In the particular instances cited from Fearne, the remainders were only to take effect if a particular party returned from Rome, or if a particular act were done. In such cases, it is impossible to hold that the remainders are vested without altering the words; for, if the remainders were held to be vested, the remainder-men might, by forfeiture, &c., come into the enjoyment of the lands and hold them, though in fact, ultimately, the event should not happen in which alone they were to take. So, if the remainder were in tail, a recovery might be suffered, discharging the entail from the determinable quality, &c.; and the lands would be enjoyed for ever, contrary to the expressed intention. This would be making a will, and not construing it. It is not necessary to contend that there is any reason for so altering or moulding limitations of that nature, or, in other words, where a testator has declared that a remainder-man shall take if a certain event shall happen, that he can be made to take before the event happens, and without regard to the fact whether it may happen or not. At the same time, in the converse case, where a testator has declared that a party shall take in remainder until a certain event happen

(thus giving him an estate, not to vest on the happening of the event as a precedent condition, but determinable on the happening of the event), there is still less reason, considering the anxiety of the law to make estates vested, to say that the remainder-man shall take, not a vested estate, but a contingent one. What object could the law have in rendering it contingent?

It is clear that, were it not for the power which a tenant in tail has of destroying the determinable quality of the estate, the point of the contingency, any more than the point of new interests, would never have been raised in the principal case; since, on the devolution of the earldom on the late earl, the estate tail of the plaintiff in error would have ceased, and these points would have become of no practical consequence. But this cannot influence the decision of the Court. It must be presumed that this power is lodged in a tenant in tail for wise reasons; and it was for the testator, if he had intended it, to frame, as he might readily have done, the limitations in such a way as to have prevented the exercise of this power. The Court, in considering the form of the remainders laid before it, and in determining whether vested or contingent remainders would be created, will discard from view the trust for preserving contingent remainders, and the point as to recoveries, and look at the case as if the tenant for life had, after the birth of a son, made a feoffment or levied a fine for the purpose of destroying the remainders as being contingent, and the point had been whether he could succeed in effecting this object, or whether the son could not take advantage of the forfeiture; so that, should the earldom not devolve in the lifetime of the tenant for life, the son might enjoy the estate according to the testator's will.

It cannot be necessary to observe, with reference to the case put, at the conclusion of (12.), to prove that the form of words cannot influence the legal result, that the words "if B. survive" are, in that particular case, rejected as of no force, simply because, in the particular case, they are considered to have no meaning. They are rejected, too, in favour of creating a vested estate, instead of a contingent one.

The defendant in error professes (11.) not to contend that the word "if" is to be introduced into the forms: if so, there was no necessity for his suggesting two forms, one with the word "if" expressly introduced, and the other in different language, but that too accompanied with explanations. The attempt was to evade the natural construction of the words used.

The passage in the paper III., commented upon in IV. (8.), referred to the case of a set of limitations by way of remainder, each limitation being made separately determinable according to the form quousque, submitted by the plaintiff in error, without a further common proviso of cesser and gift over, but with a declaration superadded, that the sons, on their births, should take vested estates. That the testator's intention, in the principal case, was to create vested estates, is clear: indeed, this is admitted on the other side; for it is allowed that the remainders limited by the will were vested, subject however to be divested by way of executory devise or shifting use. But there is no necessity to resort to the doctrine of executory devise or shifting use, in a case where the remainders limited are in tail, and not in fee. This is not a question of alternate or substituted limitations in fee, where, by necessity, either the remainders must be contingent, or the limitations over operate by way of executory devise or shifting use, on the common doctrine that a remainder cannot be limited expectant upon a fee. The difference between limitations in fee, and limitations in tail, is overlooked in the observations on the other side (7.).

The matter under discussion is wholly independent of Fearne's point as to conditional limitations (Cont. Rem. p. 18.). This point the other side must be understood to have abandoned, since Newis v. Lark, or Scolastica's Case (Plowd. 408.) is not disputed by them.

The observations on the proviso, viewed as an independent proviso of cesser, and the assertion that a simple though perfect clause of cesser, in the first case, would carry the estate to the heir at law, unless new uses were raised by implication, are, equally with the other observations as to the contingency of the remainders, opposed to the argument in the Court below (antè, p. 36.). The authorities adduced in the argument shew that a simple clause of cesser would be sufficient: but, if not, the only object of a clause of gift over, in cases like the present, is to obviate any doubt whether there might not be a resulting use to the heir-at-law, on the ground of the failure of the remainders by their losing their support by the cesser of the particular estates. In this view, to revert to the case put in argument, of an estate to a woman during her life, if she should so long continue a widow, and, after her decease or marriage, then with remainder over, the clause of cesser, in cases like the present, may be considered equivalent to the clause confining the estate for life to the widowhood; and the clause of gift over, equivalent to the provision that, upon the marriage, the remainder-man should take; but the clause of gift over is, in strictness, unnecessary; and, when particular estates are made to cease as if the parties were dead, &c., the limitations are in effect struck out of the will. With reference to the imperfection in the present clause, it can, in this view, make no difference whether the estates are made to cease expressly, or by implication.

TINDAL C. J., in Easter term following (May 10th, 1836), delivered the judgment of the Court.

This case comes before us upon a writ of error from

the Court of King's Bench. It is a case of great importance, not more on account of the large interests at stake between the contending parties, than from the nature of the legal questions which are involved in it; and it has been argued before us with a measure of learning and ability, on each side, corresponding with the importance of the case.

The special verdict finds, amongst other things, the seisin of Sir George Savile; that he duly made and published his will, bearing date the 18th of August 1783, the material parts of which will are set out therein; and that, in January 1784, he died seised without revoking or altering his will: that, after the death of Sir George Savile, Richard Lumley entered into possession of the premises in the declaration mentioned, having, in all respects, complied with the provisions contained in the will: that, in the month of September 1807, the Earl of Scarborough died without issue male, and the title of the earl descended and came to Richard Lumley Savile; and, thereupon, the defendant below entered into possession of the premises in question, and in all respects complied with the provisions of the will; and that he still continued in possession. The special verdict further sets forth indentures of lease and release, dated the 27th and 28th of November 1809, by which the defendant and his eldest son, then being of the age of twenty-one years, convey to George Tennant, for the joint lives of himself and the defendant, for the purpose of making him tenant of the freehold, in order that a common recovery might be suffered; and that such common recovery was accordingly suffered in the Michaelmas term next following, in which the defendant's eldest son, being tenant in tail, was vouched as first vouchee; the uses of which recovery were, by a subsequent deed, declared to be, to the defendant for life, with remainders over. And the special verdict then proceeds to set forth indentures of lease and release of the 1st and 2d of July 1817, by which Frederick Lumley the elder, the father of the lessor of the plaintiff, and Frederick Lumley the younger, the lessor of the plaintiff, for the considerations therein mentioned, convey the premises therein described to certain trustees upon the same trusts as the uses which had been declared with respect to the common recovery, and enter into the several covenants therein contained. And, lastly, the special verdict finds the death of Frederick Lumley the elder, in September 1831, leaving the lessor of the plaintiff his only son; and that, on the 17th of June 1832, Richard Lumley, Earl of Scarborough, died, whereby the title of earl descended and came to the defendant; since whose death possession of the premises has been demanded from the defendant by the lessor of the plaintiff, and refused.

Upon the facts stated in this special verdict, it has been contended, on the part of the plaintiff in error, the defendant below, that the judgment which has been given by the Court of King's Bench is erroneous, upon three distinct grounds: —

First, that, by the deeds of lease and release of the 1st and 2d of July 1817, all the right and interest to the premises in question, which the lessor of the plaintiff could claim under the will of Sir George Savile, was conveyed by him and his father to the trustees named in the deed of release; or, if the interest of the lessor of the plaintiff was of such a nature as to be incapable of passing under a conveyance by way of lease and release, then that the covenants of the lessor of the plaintiff operated operated by way of estoppel against the plaintiff, so as to prevent his maintaining the present action.

Secondly, that, upon the proper construction of the clause in the will of Sir George Savile, by which he provided for the cesser and determination of the estates created by his will, upon the title of Earl of Scarborough descending or coming to any of the devisees mentioned in his will, and for the hereditaments going immediately over to the person or persons next in remainder, such clause of cesser and shifting of the estate applies only to the first devolution of the earldom; and that, having taken effect once upon the descent of the earldom to Richard, it can have no effect or operation a second time on the descent of the earldom from Richard to the defendant below.

And, thirdly, that, upon the proper construction of the whole will of Sir George Savile, the defendant below took such an estate as enabled him, under the events which have happened, to suffer the common recovery which has been suffered; and that such common recovery has barred and destroyed any estate which the lessor of the plaintiff would otherwise have taken under the said will.

It becomes unnecessary, in consequence of the opinion at which we have arrived on the last point, to state the view we entertain upon that which has been raised as to the effect and operation of the lease and release of the 1st and 2d of July 1817: nor, indeed, for the same reason, will it be necessary to enter upon a separate and distinct consideration of the second question that has been raised; although, indeed, that question must incidentally come under discussion in considering the third and main ground of objection to the judgment brought under under review. It will be sufficient to observe, as to these two questions, that, as at present advised, we see no reason to differ from the opinion which has been expressed upon them by the Court of King's Bench. But if, upon the whole of the will, such estates were taken by the plaintiff in error and his eldest son respectively, as enabled them to suffer a common recovery, and if the effect of such common recovery is to bar the estate and interest under which the lessor of the plaintiff claims, the plaintiff's right of action is of course gone; and the judgment which has been given for him must then be reversed.

It appears to us, therefore, that the whole of the controversy between the parties may be almost reduced to this single inquiry, — what is the legal construction, and what the legal consequences, of the proviso of cesser and determination before adverted to? If no such clause had been inserted in the will, it is obvious no question whatever could have arisen between the parties. Upon that supposition, the defendant below, being tenant of the freehold at the time the common recovery was suffered, was able to make a good tenant to the præcipe; and, John the son being tenant in tail next in remainder, and having been vouched by the tenant of the freehold, such recovery would, upon the ordinary principles, bar the estate tail of John the son, and all other estates in remainder expectant thereon; amongst which, in the case above supposed, was the estate tail of Frederick the lessor of the plaintiff. For, as to the interposition of the estate to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, it has been properly admitted, in the course of the argument, that such interposition would have had no effect as to the operation of the recovery in barring the subsequent estates estates tail in remainder. It is, therefore, the insertion of the proviso, and that alone, which creates the difficulty in the case; and it is upon the meaning and construction of that clause, and the legal consequences attending it, that we think the decision of the present case must depend.

SCARBOROUGH
against Dor dem.
SAVILLE.

Now the argument on the part of the lessor of the plaintiff has been, that, upon the face of the will, the intention of the testator is manifest, that the earldom, and the estates devised by the will, should never be united in the same person; and that the proviso is framed to carry such intention into effect, by declaring that, as often as it shall happen that the title of Earl of Scarborough shall descend or come to any of the persons named as remainder-men, or to any of their sons (within the period limited by the will), the estates which they respectively took should cease, determine, and become void; and that new estates for life and in tail should thereupon immediately be created, and vest in the person next in remainder to him to whom the earldom descended or came: and it is contended, that the proviso attached, in the event which has taken place, to the life-estate of John the father, and, by reason thereof, the conditional limitation created by the proviso is not barred or destroyed by the common recovery. And, again, that the new estate tail so created by the proviso in Frederick the son, was not expectant upon the estate tail of John the son, but altogether independent of it, and substituted instead of the old estate created by the will; and, consequently, not barred or in any way affected by the common recovery. The defendant below, on the other hand, contends that there is no intention apparent upon the will that the shifting clause should operate more than once,

once, and that, having once had its operation in the case of the devolution of the title to John, it cannot have a second: that the proviso is one of cesser and determination only, and acceleration of the estates in remainder, and not a proviso which creates any new estates; and, consequently, that the old remainder in tail in the lessor of the plaintiff, which was created by the will, is barred.

Upon this state of the argument between the parties in error, one point, on which they are directly at variance, is, whether the proviso in question operates only as a simple cesser and avoidance of the old estate and acceleration of the remainder, or as the creation and substitution of new estates in remainder by way of shifting use; and, as the determination of this question appears to us to go almost the whole length of deciding whether the common recovery did or did not bar the estate tail, under which the lessor of the plaintiff claimed at the trial, we think it entitled to the first consideration: and it is the more entitled to such consideration from the circumstance, that the substitution of a new estate in the place of the old remainder in tail, in the lessor of the plaintiff, appears to be the ground on which the Court below have relied, in giving their judgment in favour of the lessor of the plaintiff.

Now, before we come to the construction of this proviso, we cannot but observe, in the first place, that, whilst the intention of the testator ought to be our only guide to the interpretation of his will, it must be his intention to be collected from the words employed by himself in his will. No surmise or conjecture of any object which the testator may be supposed to have had in view can be allowed to have any weight in the construction struction of his will, unless such object can be collected from the plain language of the will itself. With respect to the intention of the testator, to be collected from the will in question, it is observable that the will contains no devise by which the title and the estate are prevented altogether from becoming united in the same person, even within those periods of time during which he had the power by law of preventing such union: for many cases might be put, and some have been put in the course of argument, depending upon events of no improbable occurrence, in which, notwithstanding the provisions in the will, such union must necessarily take place. To mention one instance only, there is nothing in the will to prevent the union of the title and estate in a grandson of any of the tenants for life, where the estate has descended to the grandson before the devolution of the title upon him. The question, therefore, does not turn upon any such general intention, for none such is expressed; but the question is, whether the testator has, by the proviso in his will, declared an intention, and with sufficient clearness, to reach the case which has actually happened; and whether he has employed such machinery in his will as is capable of carrying such declared intention into effect.

In the second place, we hold it to be a necessary rule in the investigation of the intention of a testator, not only that we ought to look to the words of the will alone, to determine the operation and effect of the devise, but that we ought to disregard altogether the legal consequences which may follow from the nature and qualities of the estate, when such estate is once collected from the words of the will itself. In determining, therefore, whether the intention of the testator was in any particular ticular case to give the devisee an estate tail or for life only, we cannot think it a sound or legitimate mode of reasoning, to import into the consideration of that question, that, if the estate is held to be an estate tail, the devisee will have the power of defeating the intention of the testator altogether by suffering a common recovery. For the power of a tenant in tail to bar the estate tail, and all remainders dependent thereon, by a common recovery, is a power which the law annexes to the nature of the estate of tenant in tail: and we have no right to assume that the testator was himself ignorant of such legal consequence and effect, or that he had not taken it into his calculation when he gave such estate tail to the devisee.

The only safe course is to look carefully for the intention of the testator, as it is to be derived from the words employed by him within the whole of the will, regardless alike of any general surmise or conjecture from without the will, or of any legal consequence annexed to the estate itself, when such estate is discovered within the will.

Now, looking at the proviso, upon the construction and legal operation of which it is agreed that the question before us entirely turns, we think, in the first place, it is open to some little doubt whether the proviso declares the intention of the testator with sufficient clearness, that the shifting of the estates created by the will shall take place more than once on the devolution of the title to a tenant in possession of the estate under the will; or, in other words, whether the proviso is not so worded as to have performed the full effect for which it is framed, and of which it is capable, when the title descended to Richard Lumley, the first tenant

for life, and whether, therefore, it is not incapable of a second operation upon the devolution of the title to John Lumley, the defendant below, the next tenant for life in remainder: and, unless the proviso operates on the descent of the title to John Lumley, it is needless to observe that the remainder, under which the lessor of the plaintiff claims, must be barred by the common recovery which has been suffered.

[1836.]

SCARBOROUGH
against Dox dem
SAVILLE.

But, waiving the further consideration of this question, as being one that may be subject to some doubt and uncertainty, and admitting, for the sake of argument, that the clause did operate upon every devolution of title within the limits prescribed in the will, we proceed to state the construction of the proviso in which we have all, upon the best consideration we can give the question, agreed. For we think this proviso is so framed, as to be a proviso of cesser and determination only of the old estates created by the will to which it applies, so as to accelerate and let in the enjoyment of the remainders over, and not a proviso which creates any new estates in remainder; and, consequently, that, by the common recovery suffered by John the father, the tenant for life, and John the son, the tenant in tail in remainder, the old remainder for life in Frederick the father, and the old remainder in tail in Frederick the son, which were expectant on the estate tail in John the son, were effectually barred; and that there are no new estates created and substituted in their stead under which Frederick can claim.

First, the proviso is, in its ordinary construction, one of cesser and determination only, thereby accelerating the old estates.

The words contained in the first branch of the proviso itself, point to nothing else : — “ The estate which he or they shall then be entitled unto,” “ shall then cease, determine, and become void.” These are the operative words of the proviso, words of express cesser and determination, in which there is the total absence of the expression of any intention to create a new estate.

The words contained in the second branch of the proviso are equally restrained. It continues thus : — “ and the same manors and hereditaments shall immediately thereupon go to the person and persons who, under the limitations aforesaid, shall then be next in remainder” &c., “ in the same manner as such person or persons so in remainder as aforesaid would take the same by virtue of this my will, in case he or they to whom the title of the said earl of Scarborough shall come and fall in possession as aforesaid was or were actually dead without issue.” So that the words in this branch also are strictly confined to the estate of the person to whom the title descends. His estate is to cease, as if he were dead without issue ; and all other estates to remain as they stand in the will : so that, if the title descends upon a tenant for life, the estate of such tenant for life, and the estates tail in remainder in all his sons, successively, cease by necessary implication ; if it descends upon one of the sons, the tenants in tail, the estate tail in such son of the tenant for life fails only, and the manors go over to his next brother in tail. This latter branch of the proviso, therefore, contains no words indicative of any intention that new estates should be created. The manors, &c., are to go over “ to the person and persons who, under the limitations aforesaid, shall then be next in remainder.” This is only applicable to the estates in remainder already created by the limitations of the will,

will, not to new estates for the first time created by the proviso. The manors, &c., are to go over "in the same manner as such person or persons so in remainder as aforesaid would take the same by virtue of this my will, in case he or they to whom the title shall come," "was or were actually dead without issue." They are to take in the same manner as if the prior tenant for life, or remainder-man, were "actually dead without issue;" that is, as if the prior estates had determined by the natural course of their determination, viz., the failure of issue: which provision points to the mere blotting out of the prior estates, and to the accelerating the old estates in remainder already created by the will, and not to the creating of new estates. From the beginning to the end of the proviso, there are no words of new devise over to the remainder-man upon the avoidance of the intermediate estates; but, on the contrary, a distinct reference to the vesting of the same estates in remainder which are already devised by the will.

Again, if the proviso should be construed to create new estates, this difficulty arises, — that there are no words in the proviso, which, upon a natural construction, expressly create any new estates beyond those which are to be taken by the person or persons immediately next in remainder: so that all new estates in remainder, subsequent to the first, after the devolution of the title takes place, if any such there are, must depend upon implication only. Whereas, upon the construction that the clause is one of cesser and determination, and no more, all the remainders, as they are now declared upon the face of the will, are simply accelerated and let into possession, in succession, one after the other, in the order in which they are so declared in the will.

It has, indeed, been observed in argument, that the condition which follows the proviso, that the persons taking under the clause in question should perform and comply "with the condition or proviso hereinbefore contained for taking and using the surname, and quartering the arms of Savile as aforesaid," shew the intention that the estates in remainder, after the proviso was called into action, should be new estates; otherwise, it is said, what occasion was there to repeat the condition? But these words were probably inserted pro majori cautela only; for, in either construction of the proviso, they are equally unnecessary; because the arms and name clause does, by its very terms, apply to every person who, by virtue of the will, should be entitled; which words there clearly mean, by virtue of any clause in the will: and those who take by the proviso, even supposing they take new estates, take in that way. This argument, therefore, as it appears to us, proves nothing.

But it is, on the other hand, not an unimportant argument, and appears a strong confirmation of the construction contended for by the plaintiff in error, that, if the proviso had the effect of creating new estates, in the event of every successive devolution of the estate, within the limits assigned, there are no words to be found in the proviso which expressly apply to the cesser or determination of these new estates created by the first devolution, upon a second or any subsequent devolution of title. The proviso refers in express terms to the estates which have been already created by the will. It declares the cesser and determination of the estates "which he or they shall then be entitled unto, in all and every the manors and hereditaments hereinbefore devised, under or by virtue of this my will."

No

No reference whatever is made to the cesser or determination of a new set of estates, not expressly created by, or taken under, or by virtue of, the will; but which new estates are supposed to be taken under the conditional limitation itself, which conditional limitation can only take effect at a period subsequent to the making of the will, and when the event stated in such proviso takes place.

The lessor of the plaintiff reads the clause as if it had been framed so as, upon the descent of the title to the first tenant for life or tenant in tail, to determine and avoid their respective estates, and to create a new set of estates in remainder, in conformity with the succession marked out in the will. Again, upon a second descent of the title to the next tenant for life or his son, to determine and avoid the new estates which were created by the former descent; and, again, to create a new set of estates in remainder in the same order as before; and so, toties quoties. But, if such be the proper construction of the proviso, how is the first set of new estates to be determined? Not by any words inserted in the proviso itself, for there are none; but by importing into the new limitations a similar proviso, and so determining that new set of estates by the effect of such implied proviso; and so, on every subsequent creation of new limitations, a new proviso must be implied. And, further, if this difficulty be overcome, the effect of this construction would be, to give to each person in remainder, not two interests only, viz. the remainder in tail originally created by the limitations of the will, and one possibility created by the proviso, but the remainder in tail and an indefinite number of possibilities, according to the number of devolutions of title which might take place between the death of the testator and the expiration of twenty-one years after the death of the survivor of the sons of the first-named Earl of Scarborough. This construction appears to us so little warranted by any words of the will, and to lead necessarily to so much complication, that we have no difficulty in saying that we ought not to adopt it unless absolutely compelled to do so; but that, on the contrary, we are bound to adhere to the more simple and natural construction of the words contained in the clause. And it is not unimportant to observe, that no case has been cited at the bar, nor any authority of any text writer brought forward, in support of the position, that a proviso expressed in the same or similar terms with the present has the effect of creating a succession of new estates.

But it was argued at the bar (a) that, even supposing the proviso not to have the operation of creating new estates, but that, on the devolution of the title, the old estates were simply accelerated,—still the estate which Frederick actually took, by way of conditional limitation or shifting use, is not a remainder expectant on the estate tail of John the son: for it is contended that it was not limited to commence where the preceding estates were, by the nature and extent of their original limitation, to expire or determine; but was limited so as to be altogether independent of the measure or extent originally given to those preceding estates; and so as to take effect in possession on an event which might happen before the regular determination to which those estates were liable from the nature of their original limitations; and so as, not to wait for the expiration of those estates,

which is the known essential description of a remainder, but to rescind them, and come in by anticipation. It is argued, therefore, that the estate for life claimed by Frederick the father, and the remainder in tail claimed by Frederick the son, were estates springing up and vesting in enjoyment at the very moment the title devolved on John Lumley the defendant, during his estate for life, and anterior to the commencement of the estate tail of John Lumley the son. The recovery, therefore, cannot, as it is contended, bar this estate tail, so springing up, under the operation of the proviso, pending the estate of John the tenant for life.

The Earl of

But, supposing this argument to be correct, and that these limitations cannot be shaped or treated as remainders on the principle of Scolastica's Case (a), still it appears to us that the whole force and virtue of this argument depends upon the assumption, that the estate tail so springing up is not the same estate and interest as was originally limited in remainder, after the estate tail of John, but another and different interest. Whereas, for the reasons before given, we think this estate, so coming into possession by the operation of the proviso, is no other than the same identical interest which Frederick the son took under the limitations of the will, but vesting in enjoyment at a different time, and in a different mode, under the event which has happened: such estate, when it vests in possession under the conditional limitation contained in the proviso, being by the express words of the proviso directed to go to the person or persons who under the limitations of the will shall then be next in remainder, “in the same manner as such person or persons so in remainder as aforesaid would take the same, by virtue" of the will, in case the last taker had been actually dead without issue. Even, therefore, admitting the estate to spring from the estate for life in John on the devolution of the title to him, it is no more than the old estate which has been already barred by the common recovery.

As the ground upon which we have come to our conclusion rests upon the construction of the proviso, on which construction we feel ourselves compelled to differ in opinion from the Court below, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the other points which came under the consideration of that Court, or the cases cited by them in their judgment. One of those cases, that of Roper v. Hallifax(a), upon which considerable reliance was placed, may however be admitted to have been rightly decided, without weakening the ground upon which our judgment rests; for it may be well held that the recovery suffered, in that case, by the tenant for life and the remainder-man in tail, should not extinguish a power which was attached to the estate of the trustees for preserving contingent remainders during the estate of the tenant for life, nor bar the new estates created by the exercise of that power; and yet, at the same time, the recovery suffered in the present case, by the tenant for life in possession and the next remainder-man in tail, may be sufficient to bar the old estates expectant on such estate tail which continued unaltered by the proviso, except as to the time of enjoyment.

Upon the whole, the contention on the part of the lessor of the plaintiff is briefly this: that the estate tail of Frederick, arising under the proviso, upon the descent of the title to John the father, is precedent in point of limitation to the estate tail in John the son, the vouchee in the recovery, and consequently is not barred by such recovery.

SAVILLE.

But the defendant below denies that the proviso has any other force than that of blotting out and avoiding the estate of the preceding takers under the will, as if they had been dead without issue, upon the event of the title descending to any one; thereby letting into possession the other remainders and interests; but in all other respects leaving them precisely as they were before. And that, as a common recovery was suffered by the father, then tenant for life, and the son, the tenant in tail in remainder, who by law had at the time the power to suffer it, such common recovery had its ordinary effect in barring and extinguishing all remainders and other interests of every nature subsequent to such estate tail; of which description, at that time, was the estate tail in Frederick the son: and that, the common recovery being good at the time it was suffered, no defeating of the estate for life or the estate tail by a condition subsequent, the event not happening until after the recovery has been actually suffered, can have the effect of avoiding any of its legal consequences, which have then actually taken place, one of which is, the extinguishing of the old remainders.

And, as we have arrived at the conclusion, that the old remainder in tail vested in Frederick under the limitations of the will was destroyed, and that he took no new estate under the proviso, we think the lessor of the plaintiff below had no title upon which he could maintain his ejectment; and that the judgment below must be reversed.

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. What constitutes.
L. R. died seised of freehold premises, leaving a widow, and a son (by her), R. R., his heir at law, twelve years old. The widow entered into receipt of the rents, and two years afterwards married again, and went to reside on the premises, which she occupied with her second husband during his life, and from his death until her own, the whole period of such occupation by her being more than fifty years. During her occupation she frequently said that the premises, after her death, belonged to R. R.; but she left a will devising the property to H., her son by her second husband, and describing it as having descended to her from her mother. After her death H., then in possession, promised that he would sign an agreement to rent the premises under R. R., but he never did sign it.

Held, that upon these facts, a jury was not bound to find an adverse possession by the widow during the fifty years. Doe dem. Roffey v. Harbrow, 67. (n.)

ANCIENT LIGHTS.

Right of, how affected by alterations.

Plaintiff had a barn, in the side of which, adjoining defendant's premises, were apertures, by which, chiefly, the barn was lighted. Plaintiff converted the barn into a malt-house, and cut windows where the apertures had been in the barn. Defendant erected (on his own ground) a fence before the windows, which obstructed the access of light. In an action on the case for such obstruction, evidence was offered at the trial to shew that the mode of enjoying the light had been essentially altered by the plaintiff himself, in a manner prejudicial to the defendant. The Judge did not receive the evidence, but directed the jury, if they thought that the defendant had left the plaintiff less light than he enjoyed before the present windows were made, to give damages for such diminution :

Held, on motion for a new trial, that evidence of the above description was receivable, and that it might have appeared from such evidence that the plaintiff had altogether lost his right to the enurement in question. Garritt v. Sharp, 325.

ASSIGNMENT.

Where a termor assigns his goods, estate, and effects to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, Quære, whether the trustees have the same option of accepting or rejecting the term, with assignees of a bankrupt; and whether they can divest themselves of it without a formal disclaimer?

But, although the assignment be sufficient to vest the term in the trustees unless disclaimed, and they do not disclaim, assumpsit for use and occupation cannot be maintained against them without proof that they have actually occupied.

It is not sufficient for this purpose to prove that they placed persons temporarily upon the premises to take care of and sell goods which were part of the assigned property, and which were accordingly sold on the premises; and that, under a mistake of the law, they paid rent to the landlord for the half year in which the assignment took place. *How v. VI. Money had and received.

1. What amounts to an admission of.

Defendant held land in trust to receive the rents and pay 50*l.* half-yearly to plaintiff's wife, and the residue, deducting for repairs, land-tax, &c. to plaintiff. Defendant left word for plaintiff at a bank, where he had been accustomed to pay in such residue to plaintiff's use, that he would pay plaintiff 10*l.* on his giving defendant a receipt for 27*l.*; plaintiff did not offer the receipt, and the 10*l.* not being paid, he sued defendant for it as money had and received, and on an account stated. Defendant offered to prove that, at the time of his proposal to pay 10*l.*, he had laid out more than 27*l.* in repairs, but the evidence was rejected. Plaintiff having obtained a verdict for 10*l.*, and defendant moving to enter a nonsuit:

Held that, upon the evidence, defendant might be taken to have admitted a balance of 10*l.* in his hands to plaintiff's use; and if so, that he could not, in defence, either set up his character of trustee, or offer evidence to shew that the balance did not exist. Roper v. Holland, 99.

2. Against bailee without reward, for money represented to be lost.

Plaintiff employed defendant, without reward, to carry 45*l.* for him to a person at Liverpool. Defendant did not deliver it, and afterwards told plaintiff that he had lost it in a brothel, but would repay it to him. There was no other evidence how the loss had happened.

Plaintiff sued defendant for 45*l.* had and received to his use.

Held, that the action lay, independently of the promise, defendant not having paid over the money or returned it to plaintiff: that if a loss, in the manner alleged, had been proved, the action should have been for gross negligence, and not for money had and received; but that the defendant's assertion was not satisfactory proof of his own gross negligence. Parry v. Roberts, 118.

ATTORNEY.

I. Notice previous to admission.

1. The clerk of an attorney in the country gave directions for putting up and entering his notices, pursuant to the rule, Trin. 31 G. 3., before Hilary term 1835, in order to his being admitted an attorney in Easter term following. The person employed gave notices, which were in all respects regular, except that they named the wrong person as the attorney to whom the clerk had been articulated.

On affidavit that the inaccuracy proceeded wholly from mistake and inadvertence, the Court allowed the notices to be amended in Easter term, and the party to be admitted in the term following. Ex parte Clarke, 72.

2. Amendment allowed in notice for admission of an attorney, by inserting his place of residence. Ex parte Jones, 74. (n.)

3. An attorney cannot be admitted, whose notices have not been affixed, nor entry made, till the third day of the term in which he applies.

Though the notices were affixed, and entry made, before the last term but three, such notices continued so affixed and entered during the whole of that term, purporting that the application would be made in the next ensuing term, which was not done. In re Parsons, 74. (n.)

4. An attorney, who was off the rolls from his agent having neglected to take out his certificate, gave notice to the stamp office, before Easter term, that he should move for re-admission in Trinity term. Trinity being mentioned in the notice by mistake for Easter. On affidavit of the fact, and by consent of the Stamp Office, the Court allowed allowed the re-admission in Easter term. Ex parte Nuttall, 188.

II. Certificate.

Neglect to renew, its effect.

An attorney who, after being examined, sworn, and admitted, neglects for a year to take out his certificate, is not an unqualified person within stat. 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11.; and, if he practise, without being re-admitted, in the name of another attorney, he is not, therefore, liable to imprisonment, nor the other attorney to be struck off the roll, under that statute; though the latter would be punishable under the general jurisdiction of the Court. In re Hodgson and Ross, 324.

See also anti, I. 4.

III. What Court will enforce on him by order.

Payment over of money received for the purpose.

This Court will not, in a summary way, compel an attorney of the Court to pay over money to a party entitled to it, though the attorney has received it from a client to be paid to such party, if the application is not made on behalf of the client. In re Fenton, 404.

IV. Lien of, on damages and costs recovered in an action, how affected by set off of other parties. Costs, 7.

V. Power of attorney. See Power of Attorney.

AWARD.

1. What within arbitrator's authority.

Under the Rule of Court, Easter T., 2 G. 4., it is not sufficient to state in the rule nisi for setting aside an award, "that the arbitrator has exceeded his authority;" at least if there be no affidavit stating the particular excess. It must be shewn how the authority has been exceeded.

By an agreement of reference, reciting (among other matters of dispute) that there was a controversy between B. and D. respecting the property in a certain pump, and the right to use it, and also respecting the alleged removal by D. of a boundary hedge between his lands and those of B.; and reciting further, that B. had commenced an action against D. for alleged trespasses upon the said pump and hedge; the cause and all matters in difference were referred to an arbitrator, who was empowered to award how and by whom the said pump and hedge, and the ditch adjoining the said hedge, should in future be enjoyed and occupied, "and who should have the care and management thereof."

The arbitrator awarded that B. was entitled to the pump as his sole and exclusive property, except that D. was entitled to the free use of water from it, in common with B. In a subsequent part of the award he directed that the pump should in future be considered as belonging jointly to B. and D., and be repaired at their joint expense. He further awarded, that the hedge should be kept in repair by D., who should be at liberty to use the mud of the ditch for repairing the hedge bank, but not otherwise; and that, subject to such privilege, the ditch should be considered as the property of B.:

Held, that the award, as to the property in, and use of, the pump, was sufficiently certain and final. And that the directions as to repairs were not an excess of the arbitrator's authority.

Where a cause and all matters in difference are referred to arbitration, with a direction that the costs of the action, reference, and award, shall abide the event of such award, and be paid at such time as the arbitrator shall direct, and the arbitrator awards some things in favour of each party, so that the court cannot say upon the whole that the award is in favour of either, no order can be made as to any part of the costs; although the action was in trespass, and the arbitrator finds that trespasses were committed. Boodle v. Davies, 200.

See also Post, 4.

2. Enlargements of time, how made rule of Court. Post, 4.

3. Who must join in making award.

A dispute was referred to the decision of three arbitrators, or any two of them. A proposed award was shewn at a meeting of the three, to which one of them objected, and he, after a discussion, declared that, if the other two would not alter their view, they must make the award by themselves, and he would not join in it. Afterwards wards a draft, different from that of the proposed award, was sent by mistake to the last-mentioned arbitrator, by the other two; and he returned it with comments and objections. The two others subsequently made an award corresponding with that originally proposed, without again submitting it to the third arbitrator. The Court set the award aside. In re Pering and Keymer, 245.

4. When final.

An agreement containing several stipulations was entered into, and partly carried into execution; after which one of the parties filed a bill in Chancery, praying that it might be rescinded on certain terms; and the other party not answering, an injunction was granted, restraining him from proceeding to enforce the agreement until he should have answered, and the Court of Chancery should have made further order. The parties then referred the suit and all matters in difference between them to arbitration; and it was provided by the submission, that all proceedings in the suit should be stayed until the time for making the award, when, if none were made, either party might proceed; but that the injunction should have its full effect till dissolved.

The arbitrator awarded upon the matters of the agreement, and directed certain things to be done, the performance of which was to be taken in full satisfaction of all the matters in difference. He also awarded that each party should bear his own costs of the Chancery suit; but he made no further order as to the suit, nor did he direct that the agreement should be rescinded; and, upon motion to set aside the award for these omissions, it became a question whether or not the arbitrator had fully decided upon all the matters of the agreement:

Held, that the award was bad, inasmuch as it neither ordered the agreement to be rescinded, nor clearly determined all the matters of it; and as it did not put an end to the Chancery suit.

Orders of different judges, to the number of eleven, enlarging the time for making the above award, were made a rule of court by a single rule. In re Tribe and Upperton, 295.

(2.) Parties in a cause referred all matters in difference to an arbitrator, with power to him to direct a verdict or nonsuit, and to order the defendant, although there should be a nonsuit or a verdict for him, to pay any money, or do any other act which should be just and equitable; the costs of the suit and the costs of the reference to abide and follow the event of the award. The arbitrator directed a nonsuit; but awarded that the defendant ought to pay the plaintiff 25*l.*, and ordered him to do so:

Held, that the defendant was entitled to his costs of the suit, and the plaintiff to those of the reference. Chittenden v. Walker, 691.

BAIL.

1. Perfecting special bail, what amounts to. Statute, XXV.

2. How far discharged by amendments in record.

A declaration in scire facias on a recognizance of bail set forth the condition, which referred to a plea depending at the suit of the plaintiffs against the principal for 1200*l.* lent, 1200*l.* paid, 1200*l.* had and received, and 1200*l.* due on an account stated; and which condition was, in case the principal should not pay the damages and costs in the said plea, or render himself. The declaration then alleged that the plaintiffs declared in the said plea on the four causes of action above stated, but had leave afterwards, by order of a Judge, to amend, and did amend by substituting counts for 3000*l.* lent; the same paid; the same had and received; 500*l.* work and labour; 1000*l.* for interest; and 3000*l.* on an account stated: that the general issue and statute of limitations were pleaded, and the plaintiffs had a verdict for 2104*l.* in the whole; but for 1*s.* on the first and third counts, and for 1001*l.* on the second. That they obtained judgment for their damages, and 40*s.* costs, and 211*l.* costs of increase. That the sums of 1*s.* and that of 1001*l.*, were recovered on the promises mentioned in the recognizance; and that no part of these, or of the costs, had been paid, nor the principal rendered.

The defendants pleaded, in substance, that the recognizance was entered into in an action commenced by original, different from that action in which the recovery was had. That the plaintiffs had paid a fine to the King upon an original writ for 1200*l.*, but not upon any writ for 3000*l.* That the order for amending was not consented to by the bail, nor made a rule of Court. That, after the trial of the cause, upon argument of a case reserved, the Court, without consent of the bail, gave leave to the plaintiffs to amend their continuance roll, so as to prevent their suit from being barred by the statute of limitations. That by the amendment additional costs were incurred, and the bail were subjected to an undivided sum for costs of increase on all the counts.

Held, that the declaration in scire facias was good: that the recovery was had in the plea in which the original was sued out, notwithstanding the amendment: that costs of increase form no integral part of the subject-matter of a suit, being awarded separately by the Court; and, therefore, that the addition to the responsibility of the bail, in respect of these costs, was no ground of discharge for them; their remedy, if aggrieved, being by application to the Court; and that the other objections raised by the pleas were not maintainable. Taylor v. Wilkinson, 784.

3. Taking out of Court money deposited in lieu of bail. Statute, XXV.
4. Bailbond.

(1.) Proceedings upon.

When the defendant has been arrested and given bail to the sheriff, the plaintiff may declare de bene esse, at the expiration of eight days from the arrest, or at any time after, before special bail is perfected; and, therefore, if, without declaring, he take an assignment of the bail bond, and proceed upon it, and such proceedings be stayed upon special bail justifying, the bail bond will not be ordered to stand as a security.

If a defendant, on being arrested, give a bail bond to the sheriff, he cannot afterwards, by surrendering to the sheriff, vacate the bond; but after such surrender, and after the expiration of eight days from the arrest, if special bail be not put in, proceedings may be had upon the bail bond. Hodgson v. Mee, 765.

The holder of a bill is entitled to avail himself of notice of dishonour given by any party to the bill.

Therefore an indorsee, who has indorsed over, and is not the holder at the time of the maturity and dishonour, may give notice at such time to an earlier party, and, upon afterwards taking up the bill and suing such party, may avail himself of such notice. Chapman v. Keane, 193.

BRIBERY.

BRIBERY.

1. What constitutes, within st. 2 G. 2. c. 24. s. 7.

If A. give money to B. to induce B. to vote for a candidate at an election for a member of parliament, and B. agree to do so in consideration of the gift, A. is liable to the penalty of 500*l.* for corrupting B. to vote, within stat. 2 G. 2. c. 24. s. 7., though B. never gives the vote. A jury may infer the fact of the agreement from circumstances, although B., who is a witness, does not state that he ever intended to vote.

Where, in such a case, A.'s counsel and the Judge, at the trial of an action against A. for the penalty, put the question merely on the credibility of the evidence, and the jury found against A., the Court refused to grant a new trial on the ground that the Judge should have desired the jury to say, whether B. ever intended to give the vote.

Per Patteson and Coleridge Js., if in fact B. never did so intend, A.'s offence was complete by his giving the money for the purpose of inducing B. to vote, and by B.'s professedly accepting it on these terms. Henslow v. Fawcett, 51.

BRIDGE.

1. What constitutes a bridge.

If a Judge at Nisi Prius, being pressed to say whether, upon the evidence before him, a particular structure comes within the description of a bridge, gives his opinion on that point, as upon a question of fact, the alleged inaccuracy of such opinion is no ground for moving to set aside the verdict on account of misdirection.

Upon a question, whether a particular structure be a bridge or a culvert, the fact of its being without parapets is not decisive.

Nor the fact that it is built over water flowing in a channel between banks; though nothing can be a bridge which is not built over such a flow of water. Rex v. Whitney, 69.

CONDITION.

1. In bond, construction of.

By the condition of a bond for payment

ment of 400*l.* it was recited, that the obligor was about to marry E. E., linen draper, and thereby to become possessed of a stock in trade, now hers, and that in consideration thereof it was agreed that he should execute a bond to the obligee to pay to the children of E. E. by her late husband 300*l.*, within twelve months next after E. E.'s death, in the event thereafter specified: and the condition, therefore, was, that if S., the obligor, shall within twelve months next after the decease of E. E., pay to her child or children, &c. 300*l.*, "if upon an account of the stock in trade and effects in the linen-drapery business, if then carried on by the said S.," the same "shall amount to the sum of 400*l.*, but in case, upon such account to be taken as aforesaid, the said stock in trade and effects shall amount to less than that sum, then if the said S." shall pay to the child or children, &c. 120*l.* within twelve months next after the decease of E. E., the said obligation shall be void, &c. Plea, that E. E. died, and that, before her death, and ever since, S. had ceased to carry on the business, and that he had not, at or since the time of her death, any stock in trade, &c. Replication, that at the end of twelve months from E. E.'s decease, there were, and still are, children of E. E. by her late husband living:

Held, on demurrer, that, as the recited agreement was to pay in the event after specified, and the condition was to pay 300*l.* or 120*l.* according to an account to be taken of the business, if then carried on, the obligor might discharge himself by pleading that he had discontinued the business. Beswick v. Swindells, 868.

3. Precedent, what is.

ships to be subject to survey by the committee or their inspector at specified times: and, in case of non-compliance with orders to repair, made by the committee or the inspector, the parties neglecting to be uninsured.

An action was brought on the policy, and for money had and received and on an account stated: and money was paid into Court on two counts, one of which was on the policy, averring generally a performance by the plaintiff of all things in the policy contained to be performed on his part, and a compliance with all the conditions, &c. thereby referred to, and thereto subjoined. Held,

(2.) That, if it had been a condition precedent, the non-performance was in the nature of unseaworthiness, and was a question for the jury; and that the payment of money into Court waived any objection as to the non-performance. Harrison v. Douglas, 396. (See remainder of placitum, Payment into Court.)

CONSTABLE.

1. Liability to serve office.

H. occupied a warehouse in Manchester, within the jurisdiction of the court leet, where he carried on his business, but did not reside; and he usually lodged and boarded in Manchester from Monday till Saturday. He had also premises in Haslingden, in which township he slept when not at Manchester; and he did suit and service to the court leet of Haslingden: Held, by Lord Denman C.J. and Littledale J., and, semble, per Patteson and Williams J., that H. was liable to be appointed a constable of the Manchester leet.

In 1808 fines of 100*l.* had been imposed (and submitted to) for refusing the office of constable in Manchester, the parties fined not claiming exemption; since that time the duties of the office had greatly increased, and the number of resiants qualified to serve had diminished; and it was sworn that difficulty was expected in procuring persons to serve, unless considerable fines were imposed for refusing: Held that, under these circumstances, a fine of 300*l.* on a person merely refusing to serve by reason of an alleged exemption, was excessive. Rex v. Mosley, 488.

2. Refusal to serve office: fine. Antè, 1.
3. Right of land-tax collector to call in aid.

A collector of the land-tax is not entitled, either under the provisions of stat. 38 G. 3. c. 5. s. 17., or under his general authority, to take a constable with him into the house of a person from whom he is demanding payment of the arrear of the land-tax. But if he has reasonable ground (from past or present circumstances) to apprehend violence from such person, he may call in constables to assist in keeping the peace, and such constables are justified in staying while the collector remains to be paid, as long as there is reason to expect violence; and, if the owner of the house use violence to remove them, he is indictable for assaulting a peace-officer in the execution of his duty. *Rex v. COPYHOLD.

Surrender by feme covert.
Husband's consent.

1. How it may be expressed.

(1.) A verdict was taken for plaintiff in ejectment, subject to a special case, which stated that it was "the custom in the manor" in which the premises in question, being copyhold lands, were, that where a copyholder, being a feme covert, surrendered, if the husband consented to the surrender, such consent should be expressed in the surrender and admission; and that without his consent the surrender was inoperative. Quære, whether upon this it must be understood that, if the husband were shewn to have consented in fact, but such consent was not expressed in the surrender, the surrender was inoperative.

(2.) The custom so understood would not be bad in law.

(3.) The Court refused to amend the case, at the instance of plaintiff alone, by the Judge's notes, so as to limit it to a mere statement that the common practice was to enter the consent in the surrender and admission.

(4.) Supposing such an entry not indispensable, the Court, upon a case stated, will not, in default of evidence, assume the fact of the consent, in order to prevent the surrender from being invalidated, as against a party disputing the efficacy of the surrender and claiming as heir to the wife.

(5.) Nor will the Court so assume, upon proof that the husband had joined in a previous surrender of the copyholds to the use of a stranger for the wife's life, and was not entitled to curtesy, that he was present in the court at which the surrender in question took place; that the entry of the surrender in the court-roll was incomplete, but contained no entry of the consent; and that the surrenderee was admitted, but did not take possession.

(6.) And semble, that a jury ought not so to assume, on these facts alone.

(7.) The objection to the want of consent, or to its not being expressed in the surrender and admission, may be taken by a party claiming as heir to the wife.

(8.) The statement, in the case, of the necessity of the husband's consent, cannot be understood to apply to cases only where he has an interest at the time of the surrender.

(9.) A surrender expressed that S. "came by W. H. and R. J. his assignees duly appointed." Held to be no proof, against a party disputing the surrender, that S. had been a bankrupt, nor of W. H. and R. J. having been authorised by him to appear.

(10.) A surrender so expressed does not satisfy a custom, that a surrender may be made by attorney duly appointed, and that, when a surrender is so made, it is to be mentioned in the surrender that it was made by attorney duly appointed.

(11.) By a deed of January 1796, reciting S.'s bankruptcy, and the conveyance under it of land, belonging to S., to T. W., T. W. conveyed to B. for the purpose of making a tenant to the præcipe. B. was no party to this deed; but he, in February 1796, by deed not referring expressly to the bankruptcy or the previous deed, conveyed the lands to a tenant to the præcipe, and declared the uses of the recovery to be to his mother for life, remainder to himself in fee: the parties to the intended recovery, named in this deed, were the same as those mentioned in the preceding: Held, that B., in a suit respecting other land, was not estopped from disputing S.'s bankruptcy.

(12.) If the husband of a woman who, in 1796, has a reversionary estate tail in copyhold lands in which there is no curtesy, be proved to have been a bankrupt in 1796, and the wife's estate tail afterwards vest in possession, and she surrender it in 1803, this is not prima facie proof, as against the son of the two, claiming under the entail, that the husband had no interest at the time of the surrender.

(13.) Seemle, that it would be such prima facie proof as against the husband. Doe dem. Shelton v. Shelton, 265.

(1.) Under stat. 43 Eliz. c. 6. s. 2.

To a declaration in trespass for assaulting and beating plaintiff, imprisoning him for a long time, and during that time tearing his clothes, defendant pleaded the general issue, and, as to the assaulting, beating, and tearing the clothes, a justification. Plaintiff replied, that the detention was longer, and the other trespasses committed with more violence, than was necessary for the purposes alleged in the plea. Issue was joined thereupon, and on this and the general issue plaintiff had a verdict for one shilling. The Judge certified to deprive of costs under stat. 43 Eliz. c. 6. s. 2., and did not certify under stat. 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 9. s. 136. that a battery was proved: Held,

[1.] That as the action appeared to be for a battery, the Judge could not certify under stat. 43 Eliz.

[2.] That the battery was admitted on the record, and therefore the plaintiff was entitled to full costs without a certificate under stat. 22 & 23 Car. 2. c. 9. Bone v. Daw, 711.

[2.] Since the rule Hil. 2 W. 4. I. 98., a defendant may, before issue joined, move to stay proceedings till security for costs be given, on account of the plaintiff's residence abroad, though he has pleaded after knowledge of that fact.

Held so, where plaintiff gave notice of action, describing himself as resident abroad, April 10th, served process May 12th, declared May 23d, and received plea May 27th, and the motion was made May 30th.

By indenture of lease, reciting that L. had agreed to take premises of C., and that it had also been agreed that R. should enter into the covenant after-mentioned for securing payment of the rent, it was witnessed that in consideration of the covenants after-mentioned on the part of L. to be performed, and particularly of the covenant therein after entered into by R., the said C., at the request of R., demised to L., &c. And L. and R. covenanted to C. that they would pay him the rent on the appointed days: and further, that L., his executors, &c. should and would keep the premises in repair. There were other covenants similarly framed to this last, for matters to be performed by L., and a proviso for re-entry if the rent should be in arrear, or if L., his executors, &c. should not perform the covenants in the indenture contained, on his and their part to be performed: and there was a covenant by C. to L. for quiet enjoyment, L., his executors, &c. paying the rent and performing the covenants in the indenture before contained:

Held, that R. was jointly bound with L. by the covenant to repair, as

3. To take profits in alieno solo.

(1.) To an action of trespass for taking away sand from the plaintiff's close, it was pleaded, that the close was contiguous to the sea shore, in Cornwall; that the sand had from time to time, before the times, &c., drifted and been carried by the wind from the sea-shore upon the said close, and been there deposited; that in the parish of E. there was a custom for all the inhabitants for the time being, occupying lands in E., to enter the close at seasonable times, and take therefrom reasonable quantities of all such sand as had so drifted, &c., for the purpose of manuring the lands in their occupation in the said county; and the defendant justified as an inhabitant and occupier, &c.:

Held, a bad plea; first, because the allegation of a custom was too vague; secondly, because the supposed custom was at all events void, inasmuch as the sand, when drifted upon a close, became part of it, and the claim therefore was to take a profit in alieno solo.

(2.) Issue being joined on a plea of prescription, pleaded to a declaration for trespass in G., if the plaintiff's witness be asked, in cross-examination, questions respecting the user in other places than G., and prove such user, the plaintiff in re-examination may shew an interruption of the user in such other places.

(3.) If such witness, on cross-examination, voluntarily depose to such user, in answer to a question not relating to it, the plaintiff may still re-examine as above, unless the defendant apply to have such voluntary answer struck out of the Judge's notes.

DETAINDER.

(5.) Evidence which shews such a custom is not evidence of such a prescription, and vice versa.

(6.) In trespass quare clausum fregit, defendant justified in several pleas alleging non-existing grants, by A., B., and C. respectively, being seised in fee of the locus in quo, of profits à prendre therein, to several parties respectively seised in fee of other land, occupiers, &c., in respect thereof. The replication traversed the several grants, but not the estate of any grantor or grantees. The only evidence was of immemorial user by occupiers of the lands last mentioned: Held, that this did not support any of the pleas.

(7.) So if the pleas be of grants by persons seised in fee, to all the inhabitants of a parish, or county, and the grants only be traversed, and there be evidence only of immemorial user by the inhabitants.

(8.) On a plea that A. seised in fee granted a profit à prendre in his close to B., in respect of land of which B. was seised in fee, if issue be joined only on the grant: Quære, whether the plaintiff be estopped from disputing the seisin of A. and B.? Blewitt v. Tregonning, 554.

DETAINDER.

Proceedings on forcible detainer.

A conviction for an unlawful detainer is bad, if it only state that the prosecutor complained to the justices of an entry and unlawful expulsion and forcible detainer, and that they personally came and found the defendant defendant forcibly detaining the premises, whereupon they convict him, &c. For the justices cannot know, by their view, without evidence, that the detainer was unlawful, or that there had been an unlawful entry.

Semble, per Lord Denman C. J., that the conviction should set out the facts from which the unlawfulness of the detainer is inferred.

Semble, that such conviction ought to shew that the defendant was summoned, or had otherwise an opportunity to defend himself.

At the time of the above conviction, the defendant tendered to the justices a traverse of the force complained of; and, a few days after, an inquisition was held before the magistrates for the purpose of trying the alleged force by a jury, who, after hearing evidence adduced by both parties, found the defendant guilty; and the magistrates then gave restitution. A return was made to this Court, on certiorari, of the conviction and inquisition. The latter was entitled an inquisition indented and taken, &c., by the oaths of twelve, &c., before, &c., who say, upon their oaths aforesaid, that, &c.: stating an unlawful entry and detainer, but not reciting any complaint made by the prosecutors.

Held, that the inquisition was founded on the conviction, and could not be sustained, the conviction being void; and that the inquisition, even if looked at alone, was bad, as it did not state any complaint, nor by what authority the jury was summoned.

Held, further, that the Court was bound to award a re-restitution, as a consequence of quashing the conviction, without inquiring into the legal or equitable claims of the respective parties.

The proceedings being returned by certiorari, and the conviction being, upon a concilium and argument, pronounced bad, the Court would not, as a consequence of that judgment, quash the inquisition also, but heard its validity separately discussed on motion. Re x v. Wilson, 817.

DEVISE.

1. What words pass an estate in fee.

Tenant in fee simple devised land to his wife, her heirs and assigns, for ever, "with the intention that she may enjoy the same during her life, and by her will dispose of the same as she thinks proper." Held, that the wife took a fee; though, in a later part of the will, the deviser limited lands in fee by using the words "heirs and assigns for ever," without any additional words. Doe dem. Herbert v. Thomas, 123.

2. What words create an estate tail.

Testator, seised in fee of several estates, devised them to trustees in fee, upon trust to permit his sons and daughters respectively and severally to receive the rents and profits of the respective estates; with a clause for preserving contingent remainders. And from and immediately after the decease of any of his said children, the testator devised the estate limited to him or her for life unto or among his or her child or children living at his or her decease, for their natural lives as tenants in common, but with equal benefit of survivorship among the rest of the said children if more than one, and any one of them should die without leaving issue; the child or children of each son or daughter taking the rents and profits of his or her parent's estate only.

And from and after the decease of all the children of each of his sons and daughters without issue, he gave the estate or estates to them respectively limited, to and among all the issue of such child or children during their lives as tenants in common, and to descend in like manner to the issue of his said sons and daughters respectively, so long as there should be any stock or offspring remaining.

And for default or in failure of issue of any of his said sons and daughters, he devised the estate limited to him or her dying without issue, to the survivors of his sons and daughters, for their respective lives, as tenants in common; and after their respective deaths to the children of the survivors of them during their respective lives as tenants in common, with such benefit of survivorship as aforesaid; and after the decease of all of them, to the issue of such children, in like manner as the testator had devised the original estate of each of the sons and daughters.

And for default or in failure of issue of all his sons and daughters but one, he devised all the estates to that one in fee.

Held that, under this devise, a son of the testator did not take an immediate estate tail in the premises devised to him, but an estate for life, with remainder in tail to his children as tenants in common, remainder to himself in tail. Doe dem. Gallini v. Gallini, 340.

3. Proviso for shifting estates, how construed, and when barrable by recovery.

(1.) Lands were devised to A. for life, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male; remainder to B., A.'s younger brother, for life; remainder to B.'s first and other sons successively in tail male; remainders to other younger brothers of A.; and remainders to their sons successively in tail male; remainders over. The will provided, first, that every person who should become under the will entitled to possession of certain premises, being part of the lands devised, should take the name, &c. of S. in a certain time; and, in default thereof (such default being made during certain lives in being, or within twenty-one years after the survivor's decease), that the devise to such person should become void, and the lands should go to the person next in remainder, as if the person making default were dead, if tenant for life, or dead without male issue, if tenant in tail: secondly, that if the title to a certain earldom should descend upon A. or any of his younger brothers, or any of his or their sons during the life of A. or of any of his younger brothers, or within twenty-one years after the survivor's decease, the estate of such person, to whom the title should come, should cease, and the lands should go to the person next in remainder expectant upon the decease and failure of issue male of the person to whom the title should come, in the same manner as if the person on whom the title descended were dead without issue, such person next in remainder taking the name, &c. of S. as aforesaid.

Held, first, that the proviso for shifting the estate in case of the descent of the title, was not confined to A.'s estate, but attached to all the estates created by the will, as they should successively vest in possession.

Secondly, that on the title descending to any tenant for life, the estates were to go, not to his issue, but to the next branch of the family.

A., being in possession, a common recovery was suffered, in which the lands were conveyed (by lease and release by A. and his eldest son) to a tenant to the præcipe, during the joint lives of such tenant and A.; and A.'s eldest son was vouched over, but A. was not vouched; afterwards the title descended upon A.

Held, first, that such recovery destroyed all remainders expectant upon the natural determination of the estate tail of A.'s son, and the proviso for shifting the estates in the event of the title descending, so far as it was attached to that estate tail, and all remainders or subsequent estates limited to come into possession on the descent of the title upon A.'s son, grandson, &c.

But, secondly, that B. was entitled to claim by virtue of the proviso, not merely as defeating or determining the estate tail, but as operating antecedently to that estate; and that such antecedent claim was not barred by the recovery.

While A. was in possession, B. and his eldest son, by deed truly reciting the facts, released their interest to trustees: Admitted that, this being a release of a possibility to a party not privy in estate, and the whole truth appearing by the deed, no legal interest passed either by way of conveyance of interest or by way of estoppel. Doe dem. Lunley v. Earl of Scarborough, 2.

(2.) Lands were devised to R. for life; remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; remainder to R.'s first and other sons successively in tail male: remainder to J., R.'s younger brother, for life; remainder to trustees to preserve &c.; remainder to J.'s first and other sons successively in tail male: remainder to F., another younger brother of R.; remainder to trustees to preserve &c.; remainder to F.'s first and other sons successively in tail male: remainders to other younger brothers of R.; and (after remainders to preserve &c.) remainders respectively respectively to their sons successively in tail male : remainders over.

The will contained two provisos. -

First, that every person and persons who, by virtue of the will, should become entitled to certain premises, being part of the lands devised, should, within two years after he and they should severally become so entitled, take upon himself and themselves the surname of S., jointly with any dignity or title that might be vested in him or them, and quarter the arms of S. with his or their own family arms, and take such means as might be requisite to enable him or them respectively so to do; and, in case any such person or persons should refuse or neglect so to do, then the limitation to him or them (such neglect, &c., being made during the lives of R. or of any of his younger brothers, living at the devisor's decease, or within twenty-one years after the survivor's decease) should cease, determine, and become utterly void; and the lands should immediately go to the person next in remainder under the will, in the same manner as if such person or persons so neglecting, &c., being tenant or tenants for life, was or were dead, or, being tenant or tenants in tail, was or were dead without issue male, without prejudice to such jointures, portions, terms, &c., as, by virtue of powers afterwards contained in the will, should have been limited, &c., before such cesser or determination of the estate of the person or persons so neglecting, &c.

Secondly, that, if the title to a certain earldom (which was the only dignity or title shewn to exist in the family) should descend to any of them the said R., J., F., &c., or to any of their sons (within any of the lives, &c., as before), then, and in such case, and as and when the title should come to him or them, the estate which he or they should then be entitled to in the lands, under or by virtue of the will, should cease, determine, and become void; and the lands should immediately go to the person and persons who, under the limitations aforesaid, should then be next in remainder expectant on the decease and failure of issue male of the person to whom the title should so come, in the same manner as such person or persons so in remainder would take the same by virtue of the will, in case he or they to whom the title should come was or were actually dead without issue; such person and persons so in remainder complying with the first proviso: provided that any such cesser of the estate of the person or persons to whom the title should come should not prejudice, &c. (as before, for preserving jointures, &c.).

The title descended to K., while in possession of the lands, whereupon J. took possession, and assumed the name and arms of S.

J. being in possession, a common recovery was suffered, in which the lands were conveyed (by lease and release by J. and his eldest son) to a tenant to the præcipe for the joint lives of such tenant and J., and J.'s eldest son was vouched over, but J. was not vouched; and the uses of the recovery were declared to be to J. for life, remainder over.

While J. was in possession, F. and his eldest son, by deed truly reciting the facts, released their interest to trustees, who were strangers in interest, habendum to and to the use of the trustees in fee, upon such trusts as should correspond with the uses and trusts which had been declared of the recovery; and F. and his eldest son covenanted with the trustees that they had not encumbered or impeached, and for further assurance.

Afterwards the title descended to J. F. having died, and his eldest son having brought ejectment against J. : Held, (Assuming, first, that the second proviso was capable of operating more than once, and was not at an end upon the descent of the title to R. :

Assuming, secondly, that the proviso, upon the title coming to a tenant for life, determined the estates both of such tenant for life and of all his sons :

Assuming, thirdly, that the plaintiff was not barred or estopped by the release to the trustees, or by the above-mentioned covenants :)

That the second proviso created no new estate on the descent of the title; that the lessor of the plaintiff could claim only by virtue of the limitation expectant upon the estate tail of J.'s eldest son; and that the recovery defeated feated such a limitation, and was therefore a bar to the ejectment. Earl of Scarborough v. Doe dem. Savile.

4. On what obligations of devisor devisee liable.

(1.) B., as surety for J. became party to an indenture whereby A. leased land to J., at a rent payable by J., for a term determinable on A.'s death; and B. and J. covenanted jointly and severally for themselves and their heirs that B. and J., or one of them, or their heirs, executors, &c., should pay the rent reserved, and also a further rent, as liquidated damages, if the land were farmed contrary to the covenants of the lease. After B.'s death, rents of both kinds became due: Held, that B.'s devisees were not liable, under stat. 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14., to an action of debt for any of the sum due.

(2.) In the above action, the declaration stated that, during the term, to wit, 1st of August 1823, B. died, and that the rents became due on days named, which appeared by the dates, but were not alleged, to be later than that day. Plea, that B. died before any part of the debt became due, concluding to the Court. On special demurrer to the plea, for not traversing or denying, or confessing and avoiding, and for putting in issue matter of law: Held, that if the declaration did not shew a debt in B.'s lifetime, it was bad; and that, if it did, the plea traversed it; and that the conclusion to the Court, if bad at all, should have been specially objected to by the demurrer.

(3.) In order to induce the Court to exempt an executor, who has failed in an action brought by him in that character, from costs, under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 31., it is not sufficient that the action has been brought bona fide, under counsel's advice, and that it has been defeated on a difficult point of law, unless there be improper conduct on the part of the defendant. Unnecessary prolixity in the pleadings is not such conduct. Nor omitting to give the plaintiff information which might have prevented his proceeding with the action, if the plaintiff did not apply for the information. Farley v. Briant, 839.

1. Proceedings necessary before issuing of warrant.

(1.) By a local act commissioners were empowered to make paving rates, and to hear and relieve parties complaining of such rates. The act also gave an appeal from the commissioners to the sessions. And it provided that, on nonpayment of rates for seven days after personal demand, it should be lawful for certain justices, upon proof on oath of such demand and nonpayment, to issue a distress warrant. Justices, being applied to for such warrant, refused to grant it, but stated that they would do so if a proper information were sworn, and the party summoned before them.

The Court refused a mandamus to compel the justices to issue a warrant without summoning the party.

Supposing that the act authorised the justices to grant a warrant without summons, held, nevertheless, that they acted rightly in not so granting it. Rex v. Hughes, 425.

(2.) By statute establishing a gas light company, it was enacted, that if any person should refuse or neglect, for ten days after demand, to pay any rent due from him to the company for the supply of gas, such rent should be recovered by the company or their clerk by warrant of any justice of peace for the town, &c., and it should be lawful for the company, or their clerk, or any person acting under their authority, with such warrant, to levy the sum so due by distress and sale of the goods of the party so neglecting or refusing to pay, or the same might be recovered by action, &c.

Held, that a warrant so issued by a justice, without previously summoning and hearing the party to be distrained upon, was illegal, though a summons and hearing were not in terms required by the act.

Where a magistrate grants a warrant in the nature of execution, he is bound bound first to summon and hear the parties, unless the statute under which he acts clearly renders the discharge of that function ministerial only, or in some other manner dispenses with the summons and hearing.

In trover for distraining plaintiff's goods, the company justified under the above warrant, and stated that it was issued on the complaint of their collector, and that he, by virtue of it and under their authority, seized the plaintiff's goods for the purpose of levying a sum owing by him to them, and duly demanded according to the act.

Held, that the warrant, although it would have protected the clerk or an officer, was no justification to the company, they not having acted in obedience to it, but having put it in force as parties. Painter v. Liverpool Gas Company, 435. See also Statute XXXVII.

2. Who may justify under illegal warrant. Ante, 1. (2.); Post, 3.
3. Suspension of execution of warrant.

Two justices allowed the accounts of overseers going out of office. By a subsequent warrant, reciting that on the accounts a certain balance appeared to be in the hands of one of the overseers, which he had neglected and refused to pay, they required the succeeding overseers to distrain for the balance on his goods, under stat. 50. G. 3. c. 49. s. 1. Afterwards, a doubt being raised whether the balance was correctly ascertained, they signed an order to the overseers to suspend, and not execute, the warrant of distress. This was delivered to one of the overseers, who nevertheless distrained. An action of trespass being brought against him,

Held, that the justices had no power to suspend the order on account of a doubt as to the correctness of the balance; that the defendant, therefore, was acting under a legal warrant, and was entitled to a demand of a copy of the warrant, under stat. 24 G. 2. c. 44. s. 6.

Quare, whether the justices who issued the warrant could have suspended it under any circumstances, as, for instance, upon discovering that the balance had been paid before the warrant was signed. Barons v. Lucombe, 589.

Lessor of the plaintiff being in possession of a house and premises, defendant asked leave to get vegetables in the garden; and, having obtained the keys for this purpose, fraudulently took possession of the house, and set up a claim of title: Held that, having entered by leave of the party in possession, she could not defend an ejectment, but was bound to deliver up the premises before she proceeded to contest the title.

(2.) By a deed of January 1796, reciting S.'s bankruptcy, and the conveyance under it of land, belonging to S., to T. W., T. W. conveyed to B. for the purpose of making a tenant to the præcipe. B. was no party to this deed; but he, in February 1796, by deed not referring expressly to the bankruptcy or the previous deed, conveyed the land to a tenant to the præcipe, and declared the uses of the recovery to be to his mother for life, remainder to himself in fee: the parties to the intended recovery, named in this deed, were the same as those mentioned in the preceding: Held, that B., in a suit respecting other land, was not estopped from disputing S.'s bankruptcy.

If the husband of a woman who, in 1796, has a reversionary estate tail in copyhold lands in which there is no curtesy, be proved to have been a bankrupt in 1796, and the wife's estate tail afterwards vest in possession, and she surrender it in 1803, this is not prima facie proof, as against the son of the two, claiming under the entail, that the husband had no interest at the time of the surrender.

Semble, that it would be such prima facie proof as against the husband. Doe dem. Shelton v. Shelton, 265. (See whole placitum, Copyhold, 1.)

I. Admissions.

1. Offer to pay money, how far an admission of party having received it. Assumpsit, VI. 1.
2. Payment of money into court, what it admits. Payment into court.

II. Depositions.

Under the Bankrupt Act, 6 G. 4. c. 16. s. 92., the depositions taken before the commissioner are evidence of the petitioning creditor's debt, the trading, and the act of bankruptcy, in an action of trover brought by the assignees, though the declaration states a conversion in the time of the assignees only, if the cause of action be one for which the bankrupt himself might have sued.

For ascertaining whether or not the case is within sect. 92., the criterion is, whether the bankruptcy be only a formal step in the evidence, or whether it be so essentially a part of the ground of action that, without proof of it, no party could recover in respect of the alleged cause.

This is to be decided by the Judge, upon the opening of evidence at the trial. Küchener and others v. Power, 232.

III. Written entries.

1. Judge's notes, when sufficient to prove amount of verdict. Practice, XXIV. 2.
2. Minute book, to prove term of servant's engagement by master. Principal and Agent, 2.

IV. Deed how far conclusive.

1. As against party to it.

In ejectment by grantee of an annuity against the grantor, for premises on which the annuity was secured, it appeared that no memorial had been enrolled. The lessor of the plaintiff contended that none was necessary, by sect. 10. of the Annuity Act, 53 G. 3. c. 141., the premises being of greater value than the annuity, in proof of which he relied on a clause in the annuity deed, wherein the defendant covenanted that the premises were of more than sufficient value to answer and pay the annuity. The defendant offered evidence to prove that the premises were not of such value when the annuity was granted.

Quære, whether a covenant, as above, is a declaration which estops the party making it from afterwards disputing in an action the fact covenanted for. But, assuming that it were so in other cases,

Held, that it could not preclude a party from giving proof that the annuity was granted in contravention of the statute. Doe dem. Chandler v. Ford, 649.

2. As

2. As against persons claiming under it, but not parties to it.

An indenture of mortgage, of 1817, recited that, by a former indenture, of 1815, A., in consideration of 200*l.* conveyed the premises, of which he was tenant in fee, to C. and H. for 1000 years, subject to a proviso of redemption; that P., at the request of A., had paid C. and H. the 200*l.* and advanced a further sum to A., and that, in consideration thereof, C. and H., at A.'s request, did assign, and A. did grant, &c., to P. the premises comprised in the original mortgage, from thenceforth for all the residue of the said term of 1000 years, subject to a new proviso of redemption. In ejectment brought by the representatives of P. against those of A.,

Held, that the deed of 1817 (with proof of A.'s seisin in fee) was sufficient evidence of title in P., without production of the deed of 1815: that, if the recital of the former deed were admissible, it must be taken altogether, and showed a right in C. and H. to assign the term; and, if it were rejected, nothing appeared to prevent A., as tenant in fee, from granting a term to P.

That, if the recital in the deed of 1817 were rejected as proof of a right in C. and H. to assign, it might still be looked to for the purpose of ascertaining what term was intended to pass by the deed. And that from the whole of this deed it might be collected that the residue of a term of 1000 years, commencing in 1815, was granted to P. from 1817. Doe dem. Rogers v. Brooks, 513.

V. Secondary evidence of written documents.

1. Contents of.

Where a document is proved to have come into the hands of one party to a cause, the opposite party cannot entitle himself to give secondary evidence of its contents by shewing that it has been since lost or destroyed, unless he has served notice to produce.

Defendant in ejectment relied on a will devising all the testator's property except a pecuniary legacy. In answer, plaintiff proved that, after the execution of such will, a document, which he alleged to have been a will, was signed by the testator, and delivered to a woman whom the defendant afterwards married, since which the witness, who prepared it, had heard nothing of it. It was then asked, on behalf of the plaintiff, whether the deceased had declared that paper to be his will, and whether the witness and others had signed it in his presence: Held, that the questions could not be put, no notice having been given to produce the last-mentioned document. Doe dem. Phillips v. Morris, 46.

2. Proper execution of. Antè, 1.

VI. Stamp on probate how far evidence of assets.

Upon issue joined on a plea by an executor of plenè administravit, the amount of the stamp upon the probate is admissible in evidence.

Per Littledale J. It does not, of itself, furnish prima facie evidence of the amount of effects which have come to the executor's hands.

Per Lord Denman C. J. If there be evidence of a long acquiescence by the executor, without re-demanding any of the duty, it is prima facie evidence of such amount; but it is not of itself evidence of such amount.

Per Patteson J. It is not such prima facie evidence, even if a long acquiescence is shewn. Mann v. Lang, 699.

X. Evidence, which shows custom, how far evidence of prescription.

1. To an action of trespass for taking away sand from the plaintiff's close, it was pleaded, that the close was contiguous to the sea shore, in Corn-wall; that the sand had from time to time, before the times, &c., drifted and been carried by the wind from the sea-shore, upon the said close, and

- and been there deposited; that in the parish of E. there was a custom for all the inhabitants for the time being, occupying lands in E., to enter the close at seasonable times, and take therefrom reasonable quantities of all such sand as had so drifted, &c., for the purpose of manuring the lands in their occupation in the said county; and the defendant justified, as an inhabitant and occupier, &c.: Held, a bad plea; first, because the allegation of a custom was too vague; secondly, because the supposed custom was at all events void, inasmuch as the sand, when drifted upon a close, became part of it, and the claim, therefore, was to take a profit in alieno solo.
2. Issue being joined on a plea of prescription, pleaded to a declaration for trespass in G., if the plaintiff's witness be asked, in cross examination, questions respecting the user in other places than G., and prove such user, the plaintiff in re-examination may shew an interruption of the user in such other places.
 3. If such witness, on cross-examination, voluntarily depose to such user in answer to a question not relating to it, the plaintiff may still re-examine as above, unless the defendant apply to have such voluntary answer struck out of the Judge's notes.
 4. Quære, whether there can exist contemporaneously, in respect to the same land, a prescription and a custom, entitling to the same easement, &c.?
 5. Evidence which shews such a custom is not evidence of such a prescription, and vice versâ.
 6. In trespass quare clauum fregit, defendant justified in several pleas alleging non-existing grants, by A., B., and C. respectively, being seised in fee of the locus in quo, of profits à prendre therein, to several parties respectively seised in fee of other land, occupiers, &c., in respect thereof. The replication traversed the several grants, but not the estate of any grantor or grantee. The only evidence was of immemorial user by occupiers of the lands last mentioned: Held, that this did not support any of the pleas.
 7. So if the pleas be of grants by persons seised in fee, to all the inhabitants of a parish or county, and the grants only be traversed, and there be evidence only of immemorial user by the inhabitants.
 8. On a plea that A. seised in fee granted a profit à prendre in his close to B., in respect of land of which B. was seised in fee, if issue be joined only on the grant: Quære, whether the plaintiff be estopped from disputing the seisin of A. and B.? Blount v. Tregonning, 554.
- XI. Non-existing grant.
1. How far proved by evidence of immemorial user. Antd, X.
 2. Traverse of, what it puts in issue. Antd, X.
- XII. Evidence, how applicable to the record.
1. Variance between pleading and evidence.
 - (1.) Terms of agreement.
Where the record alleged an agreement that work was to be done "within a fortnight" before a given day, and the evidence was of an oral agreement that it should be done "a fortnight" before that day: Held, that a jury were justified in finding a variance. Thomas v. Lambert, 61. (See also Principal and Agent, 2.)
 - (2.) Designation of interest in estate.
An allegation, that A. is tenant for the life of M., is supported by proof that A. and B., being joint-tenants for the life of M., conveyed their estate by lease and release to A., without an intermediate party. Avery v. Cheslyn, 75. (See whole placitum Misdirection, 1.)
 2. Facts immaterial to the issue, examination as to. Antd, X.
 3. In particular actions.

[1.] Use and occupation.
What sufficient evidence against assignees of a term. Assignment, 1.
 - [2.] Account stated.
A promise made by defendant after action brought, to give a cognovit, is no evidence of an account stated before action brought. Spencer v. Parry, 351. (See whole placitum, Pleading III, 4. (1.)
 - (2.) Trespass.
What strictness of proof necessary

as to locus in quo described by abutments.

Declaration, in trespass, described the locus in quo by abutments on the north, east, south, and west, severally: and it was said to abut, on the south and west, "towards" certain places named. The defendant pleaded only a justification, in respect of his seisin of the locus in quo which he averred to be parcel of the manor of H., and to have been demised to him by copy of court roll. The plaintiff denied that it was parcel, &c. On the trial, the plaintiff applied his evidence to a triangular piece of land, not contiguous on all sides to the places mentioned in the abutments, but situated within their limits:

Held, first, that the statement of abutments could not be objected to, on the trial, as insufficient in itself.

Secondly, that the plaintiff might apply it, though not with strict correctness, to the triangular piece of land.

Thirdly, that the defendant could not prove his justification in respect of another piece of land, also situated within the limits of the several places named in the abutments, but not contiguous to them on all sides. Lempriere v. Humphrey, 181.

EXECUTION.

1. Proceedings where sheriff interested. Sheriff, 4.
2. Person in custody of marshal how to be changed in execution.

If a party, in custody of the marshal, at the suit of M., be charged in custody in execution at the suit of A., by a side-bar rule, without habeas corpus, such proceeding is wholly void, and the party will be discharged out of custody at the suit of A., at any distance of time from his having been charged in that custody.

Although a commitment at the suit of A. be entered on the roll, the defendant may shew that the commitment was by a side-bar rule, and not by habeas corpus, the form of entry being the same in both cases.

And if, after the expiration of a year and a day from the judgment at the suit of A., the party be brought up by habeas corpus and charged in execution at the suit A., before he applies for his discharge on the above objection, it lies on A. to show that the judgment at his suit has been revived by scire facias, otherwise the objection is not answered. Smith v. Sandys, 693.

EXECUTOR.

1. Payment of costs.

(1.) In an action brought by an executor, if the defendant has obtained a verdict, and the judge who tried the cause has, upon summons, but without hearing any affidavit, certified to deprive the defendant of costs under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 51. the Court will not review his order.

Quære, whether they have authority to do so. Maddock v. Phillips, 198.

(2.) In order to induce the Court to exempt an executor, who has failed in an action brought by him in that character, from costs, under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 51., it is not sufficient that the action has been brought bona fide, under counsel's advice, and that it has been defeated on a difficult point of law, unless there be improper conduct on the part of the defendant. Unnecessary prolixity in the pleadings is not such conduct. Nor omitting to give the plaintiff information which might have prevented his proceeding with the action, if the plaintiff did not apply for the information. Farley v. Briant, 839. (See whole placitum, Devise, 4.)

2. Liability to contribution under Building Act.

Under stat. 14 G. 3. c. 78. (Building Act) s. 41. where a party wall has been rebuilt, the person who is owner of and entitled to the improved rent of the adjoining premises, is liable to contribution out of such rent, though he be no otherwise owner than as an executor or administrator.

And this, although there be a judgment

ment outstanding, of a date prior to the pulling down of the wall, and no sufficient assets to meet it.

For the portion of the rent claimable in respect of such contribution is not assets. Thacker v. Wilson, 142.

HABEAS CORPUS.

1. After proceedings in inferior court.

A defendant in actual custody of the sheriff of a county upon process of an inferior court, having removed himself into this Court by habeas corpus cum causa directed and delivered to the sheriff only, and having been thereupon committed to the custody of the marshal, moved to be discharged on affidavit entitled as of the cause in this Court. Held that the affidavit was rightly entitled, though no step in the cause had been taken in this Court.

The defendant was arrested in Gloucestershire, in an action of debt instituted in the Court of the Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and on a warrant, issuing from that court, and reciting that the plaintiff had sworn that the defendant was a member of the university, was suspected of flight, and, as deponent believed, would not appear, but would withdraw himself out of the precincts of the university. Nothing further appeared as to the defendant's residence, either by the warrant, or other proceedings in the Chancellor's Court, or by the affidavits and sheriff's return to the habeas corpus in this Court: Held, that the defendant was entitled to his discharge, for want of proof of residence, and this, independently of the question whether or not the process of the Chancellor's Court could be executed at the place in question.

After the arrest, the defendant had appeared in the Chancellor's Court, waived the objection to the jurisdiction, and entered into the merits; upon which a decree was given that he should pay the debt, and remain in custody till he paid it, which was sworn to be conformable (as the deponent believed) to the practice of the court. After this the habeas corpus issued: Held, that the habeas corpus was not too late; and that the defendant might still insist before this Court on the want of jurisdiction. Perrin v. West, 405.

This Court, on reading the indictment only (which had been removed by certiorari), and without affidavit, ordered the prosecutor to give the defendant a note of the several acts of nuisance which he intended to prove. Rex v. Curwood, 815.

2. Who chargeable, ratione tenuræ, for non-repair of bridge. Infant.

INFANT.

Whether indictable for non-repair of bridge.

An infant, eleven years old, inherited land charged with repair of a bridge. His guardian in socage resided on the property; the infant did not, except on occasional visits: Held,

1. That although the infant was actually seised, yet, being so by the possession of his guardian, he was not such owner or occupier of the land, as to be chargeable by indictment for non-repair of the bridge.

2. That the guardian was such an owner and occupier.

Semle, that infancy would not exempt a party, liable in other respects, from indictment for such non-repair, if there were no other person against whom performance of the repairs could be enforced.

A policy of insurance on a ship, lost or not lost, is good, the ship having been accepted for insurance, and the premium paid, before loss, although the policy was not actually executed and stamped till loss had happened, and both insurer and assured knew it.

By the rules of a mutual insurance society, with which the above insurance was effected, the insurance on a ship was to commence on the day of her being accepted as insurable, and to continue in force twelve months. A member of the society gave a power of attorney to his agent, to insure ships for him under the terms, restrictions, and regulations by which the society might be governed: Held, that the power (though it did not refer to the case of a vessel being lost, and though such a case was not expressly provided for in the regulations of the society) was special enough to warrant the agent in executing the above-mentioned policy for the principal as insurer, after a loss had happened within the knowledge of all the parties, as before stated. *Mead v. MANDAMUS.

I. When it lies.

1. To lord to hold court leet.

On motion in Michaelmas term, 1834, (made more than a month after old Michaelmas-day.) for a mandamus to compel the lord of a hundred to hold hold a court leet forthwith, to appoint officers, the lord contended that he could hold it only in October; and it appeared that the court had, as far as was remembered, been held in every October until the October preceding the application, when no court was held. It was not shewn whether the leet was by charter or prescription, nor did any party swear to his belief that the leet could be held only in October. The Court, in the absence of such evidence, granted the mandamus, in Easter term, 1835, twenty-two days after Easter Sunday. Rex v. Lord of Hundred of Milverton, 284.

2. To trustees under local act, to audit their accounts. Post, III.

3. To official, to swear in churchwarden.

(1.) The Court will grant a rule absolute in the first instance for a mandamus to the archdeacon, to swear in a party as churchwarden, on affidavit of due election, demand, and refusal, and of notice to the archdeacon of the application to the Court; the ground of refusal not appearing by the affidavit in support of the rule. Ex parte Winsfield, 614.

(2.) A rule nisi having been obtained for a mandamus to an archdeacon and surrogate, to swear in certain persons as churchwardens and sidesmen of a parish, it appeared by affidavit that the parties were colourably elected, but that the validity of the election was disputed; that there was an usage in the archdeaconry to swear in the parties elected, on a certain day subsequent to the election, appointed annually by the archdeacon; and that the surrogate, being applied to immediately after the election to swear in the parties, had said that they must wait till the day appointed, but that he would not disobey a mandamus from this Court: Held, that this was a refusal, and that the usage, if a good one, should be returned to the mandamus; and the Court made the rule absolute, without entering into the question of the validity of the election. Rex v. Archdeacon of Middlesex, 615.

(3.) The Court will grant a mandamus by rule absolute in the first instance, to compel the official to administer the oath or declaration to a party claiming to have been elected as chapelwarden of a chapel (under a local act, conferring upon the officer elected the power of a churchwarden for the purposes of the chapel), though other parties claim to have been elected. Ex parte Duffield, 617.

II. When it does not lie.

1. When there has not been a demand and refusal.

(1.) By an act establishing a canal company, it was provided, that certain land owners might call upon them by notice, as directed in the act, to execute certain works, communicating with the company's canal and railways; and that, if the company should refuse for six months after such request, the applicants might themselves perform the works in the same manner as the company might have done them.

An application being made to the company under this clause, they answered that they would do the works themselves; but they delayed proceeding and, on remonstrance, gave as a reason, that the proposed operation would interfere with the property of other parties, who were likely, if so disturbed, to bring an action. The company offered nevertheless to proceed if indemnified. The applicants, in answer, stated that they considered the excuse insufficient, and did not understand how they could be expected to indemnify. Six months had at this time elapsed since the original application. The works not being done, a mandamus was applied for:

Held, that the writ could not issue, it not appearing from the above facts that, after the consent given by the company to execute the works, there had been any express demand and refusal of performance, or any conduct on the company's part equivalent to such refusal. Rex v. Brecknock and Abergavenny Canal, 217.

(2.) By statute, incorporating a canal company, the affairs of the company were to be managed by a committee, who were authorised to appoint a clerk for better carrying into execution the purposes of the act. The committee were required to enter in books an account of their disbursements, receipts, and transactions, and the books were to be open at all reasonable times to the inspection of the proprietors. A proprietor applied to the clerk for an inspection of the books which were under his charge. The clerk said he would refer the demand to the committee. The proprietor attended the committee, and there repeated his request; and the chairman said they would take time to consider it. Ten days afterwards the proprietor applied again to the clerk, who refused the inspection. On motion for a mandamus to the company to allow inspection of the books:

Held, that there had been no sufficient refusal by the committee to warrant the application.

Semble, that a party applying for a mandamus to give inspection of such documents, ought to shew that, when he demanded the inspection, he stated the object for which he wanted it. Res v. Wills. and Berks. Canal. 477.

2. To treasurer of district to pay expenses of prosecution. Prosecution, 2.

3. To Privy Council to receive a petition for rehearing appeal.

Where a cause has been brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on appeal from the Court of Arches, and the Judicial Committee has decided in favour of the appeal, at the same time retaining the unsuccessful party to appear absolutely, subject to the approbation of the King in Council, which approbation has been afterwards given, this Court cannot, on a suggestion of error in the decision, issue a mandamus to the Privy Council to receive a petition for a rehearing of the appeal.

Nor will the Court issue a prohibition to the Committee, on a complaint that they have exceeded their jurisdiction in ordering the party to appear absolutely; it not being shewn that they have either transgressed the general law of the land, or interfered in any matter not of ecclesiastical cognisance. Ex parte Smyth, 719.

4. To inferior court to alter a record.

This Court will not issue a mandamus to a court of criminal jurisdiction, to alter the minutes of a verdict according to the fact, or to cancel an alteration in such minutes, on a representation that the verdict was erroneously entered at the trial.

As where a jury at sessions, on an indictment for poisoning horses, found a verdict of "Guilty by mischance," and were then told by the chairman that they must say either guilty or not guilty, whereupon they brought the defendant in guilty, and recommended him to mercy on the ground that he had no malicious intent but administered the material to benefit the condition of the horses; upon which finding and explanation a verdict of guilty was entered. Res v. Hewes, 725.

(3.) To do an act, which may subject them to an action, where parties have another remedy. Statute, XXXVII.

III. What it must state.

A mandamus to account before auditors under the Vestry Act, 1 & 2 W. 4. c. 60., recited that the auditors "duly appointed and acting under and by virtue of an act," &c., "in exercise of the powers given to them by the said act," had summoned the parties to account. Held that, in a mandamus for this purpose, it was not necessary to state more fully the adoption of the act by the parish, and the due appointment of the auditors.

The statute enacts that the auditors "shall meet twice at least in each year, at the board room of the vestry, and (a majority of the said auditors being present at such meetings)" shall audit the accounts of such vestry; and the vestry are required, "at every such meeting," to produce a true account in writing, &c. And the auditors are to have the same power of examining the accounts of certain other boards, and are to audit them in the same manner. A mandamus issued calling upon a board to attend with, and produce to the auditors, their accounts, at such time and place, or at such times and places, as a majority of the the auditors might appoint, and then and there give such information as to the accounts as they might be enabled to give, according to the directions of the act.

On return to such mandamus, and concilium obtained on the part of the Crown: Held, that the mandamus exceeded the authority given by the act; and that the Court could not in part enforce it, by a peremptory mandamus limited as to the place of meeting. And the Court quashed the mandamus.

The Court will, for the purposes of justice, mould the rule for a mandamus; but will not mould the writ itself, on application for a peremptory mandamus.

When a return to a mandamus is made, and a concilium obtained, the counsel objecting to the return must be heard first, though the opposite counsel take an objection to the form of the mandamus. Rex v. Church Trustees of St. Pancras, 535.

IV. Whether it may be amended. Antè, III.

V. Whether it may be enforced in part. Antè, III.

VI. Return to, what it must state.

A statute directed that a sum of money should be paid to certain commissioners, who were therewith to execute all such works, &c. as should from time to time be deemed necessary, proper, or expedient for putting certain banks and bridges in a permanent state of stability and security, and for constructing the forelands and slopes of the banks, as far as practicable, upon one uniform system.

By mandamus, reciting this clause, and that the money had been paid to the commissioners, they were ordered to proceed to put the banks forthwith in a permanent state of stability and security, and to construct the forelands and slopes of the banks, as far as practicable, upon one uniform system.

Return, that the commissioners had from time to time, at all times from the passing of the act hitherto, proceeded to execute all such works "as should be, or were, from time to time deemed necessary, proper, or expedient for putting the banks in a permanent state of stability and security, and for constructing the forelands and slopes of the banks, as far as practicable, upon one uniform system."

Held an insufficient return, and a peremptory mandamus awarded. See v. Ouse Bank Commissioners, 544.

MISDIRECTION.

Of judge at trial.

1. What amounts to.

An allegation that A. is tenant for the life of M., is supported by proof that A. and B., being joint tenants for the

the life of M., conveyed their estate by lease and release to A., without an intermediate party.

Issue being joined on an allegation by plaintiff that a cornice was fixed to, and not of right removable from, the freehold, the judge desired the jury to find for defendant if they considered that the cornice was ornamental merely, fixed during the tenancy, capable of removal without substantial injury to the freehold, and so removed in fact during the tenancy. The jury found for the plaintiff. Held no misdirection. Avery v. Cheslyn, 75.

NONSUIT.

Consent of parties how far necessary. At the close of plaintiff's case leave was reserved to defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. Defendant offered evidence, and the jury retired, and were unable to agree upon their verdict. The judge, being pressed to discharge them, no counsel on either side being present, directed a nonsuit on the point which had been reserved.

On motion by plaintiff for a new trial: Held, that the nonsuit was irregular, and that defendant, in shewing cause, could not argue the point reserved at the close of plaintiff's case. Dewar v. Purday, 166.

OATH.

1. Exercise of office, before being sworn.

By the charter of the borough of Caernarvon, the constable of the castle of C. for the time being was to be mayor of the borough, sworn to the King and the burgesses, and who, having first taken oath to preserve the King's rights, should swear to the burgesses to preserve their liberties, and faithfully do the things appertaining to the office of mayoralty.

Before stat. 57 G. 3. c. 45. (for continuing civil and military offices, held of the Crown during pleasure, after the death of George III. at the pleasure of his successor), the King granted to A., by letters patent, the office of constable, to be exercised by himself or deputy, during the King's pleasure. A. took the oaths, and held the office till the death of George IV. and during the six months granted by st. 6 Ann. c. 7. s. 8. and also till a second grant by letters patent of the King, made after the expiration of those six months, but before the expiration of the additional six months given by stat. 1 W. 4. c. 6. The second grant recited the former grant, and that the King was pleased to renew the appointment, and continue A. in the office, and then granted as before; and A. took the oaths again.

After the first grant, and before the second, A. appointed the defendant his deputy; and, after the second grant, but before A. had taken the oaths a second time, A. again appointed and continued him as his deputy:

Held, that A. could not exercise the office of constable till he was sworn; that the second grant to A. was not a confirmation, but a new appointment; and that, consequently, it was necessary that A. should be sworn again, before he could exercise the office; and that (supposing A. to have the power power of appointing a deputy at all; the defendant, not having been re-appointed deputy after A. had taken the oaths a second time, was not entitled to hold that office. Res v. Roberts, 771.

2. Commission for examining witnesses, oath how far necessary.

A commission having issued to examine witnesses at Hamburgh, certain witnesses there refused to appear. On motion in this Court, it was shewn that the Court of Commerce at Hamburgh would compel the attendance of the witnesses before themselves, upon request made by this Court, and would conduct the examination, allowing commissioners named by this Court to be present, and to make suggestions; but that the members of the Court of Commerce would not take a special oath as commissioners of this Court; and that they would not compel the attendance of witnesses before any but themselves; and that there were no means of compelling such attendance.

This Court ordered a commission to issue for the examination of the witnesses, directed to the members of the Court of Commerce, without the usual clause requiring the commissioners to be sworn: Littledale J. dubitante. Clay v. Stephenson, 807.

The Court refused to grant a criminal information against the overseer.

 - (1.) Proceedings on.

The appointment of a committee to try the merits of a return to parliament, under stat. 9 G. 4. c. 22. ss. 18. 30., cannot legally take place if the petitioner be not present in person, or by his counsel or agent.

If such committee nevertheless be formed, and proceed to declare the petition frivolous and vexatious, the costs of opposing the petition cannot legally be taxed under sect. 60.

And, if the Speaker under such circumstances directs a taxation, and makes his certificate according to sect. 60., this Court, if applied to to put the certificate in force pursuant to sect. 63., will notice the irregularity of the proceedings on the petition, if brought before them by affidavit, and refuse to enter up judgment. *Brayeres v. (2.) Enforcing attendance of prisoner to give evidence.

This Court granted a rule nisi for a habeas corpus to bring up a prisoner, in custody upon a charge of felonious embezzlement, to give evidence before an election committee of the House of Commons, the rule directing notice to be first given to the Attorney General, to the committing magistrates, to the constable who apprehended the prisoner, and to all persons at whose suit

PAYMENT INTO COURT.

What it admits.

A policy declared that certain rules should be deemed a component part of the policy. By one of the rules, the assured was not entitled to be paid, in case of a loss, till a period which was made contingent upon certain events. The evidence shewed that this period had not arrived before the action was brought; but left it uncertain whether the whole payment was to be made at once, or by instalments. Held,

1. That the payment of money into Court admitted that something was due to the plaintiff on the policy at the time of the action brought, and was so far a waiver of the objection that the action was brought too soon. And,

2. That it lay on the defendant to prove that a part of the sum recoverable on the loss could be claimable by the plaintiff, without the whole being due; and that, therefore, in the absence of such proof, the objection was waived as to the whole sum. *Harri-son v. This applies also to causes removed by the defendant from inferior courts by habeas corpus (though the cause was commenced below, and removed, before the rule came into operation), except that, as judgment of non-pros. cannot be signed in such cases, the plaintiff cannot be out of court till the expiration of the year.

And, consequently, an action for malicious arrest cannot be commenced in any of the above cases till a year has elapsed from the return of the writ.

To an action of debt in a court not of record, the defendant pleaded two distinct pleas, one concluding to the country, the other with a verification. The plaintiff replied to the first, and took no notice of the other. The cause was tried, and the plaintiff had a verdict and judgment. Upon writ of false judgment:

Held, that the judgment below was right, for that the plaintiff might take issue upon the first plea, and treat the second as surplusage.

Declaration stated that defendant was indebted to plaintiff within the jurisdiction of the county court for the wages of and due and owing to plaintiff within the jurisdiction, as the servant of the defendant.

7. Assumpsit.

(1.) Promissory note, what may be pleaded to as.

By an instrument in writing, the two defendants jointly and separately promised to pay to plaintiff, or order, 50*l.* by instalments for value received; and it was declared that it was intended, by the receivers and givers of that note of hand, that all instalments should cease at plaintiff's death. Plaintiff declared in assumpsit, the first count being on the instrument, and calling it, in the declaration, an agreement or instrument in writing, except where the above language of the instrument itself was set out in the declaration. Defendants pleaded that they did not make the promissory note mentioned in the first count, as there alleged: Held, that the instrument was not a promissory note, as it created only a contingent liability; that the language used in the declaration did not authorise the defendants to call it a promissory note; and, consequently, that the plea was bad on special demurrer.

There was a second count on an account stated. The defendants pleaded first as above, without commencing the plea by actionem non, or expressly confining it to the first count (except by the language of the traverse, as above); and they also pleaded to the last count expressly. Semble, per Littledale and Patteson Js., that the first plea was in form pleaded to the whole declaration, and was therefore bad for not answering the second count. Worley v. Harrison, 669.

(2.) Want of consideration, how to be pleaded.

[1.] A plea, to assumpsit by drawer against acceptor of a bill of exchange, "that defendant received no good or sufficient consideration from plaintiff for accepting the bill" is bad on demurrer, though the plea be not specially demurred to for that defect. Graham v. Pitman, 521.

[2.] A plea to assumpsit by indorsee of B. against a prior indorser, that defendant had no consideration for indorsing, and that B. indorsed to plaintiff without any consideration, and that plaintiff had always held without any consideration, is bad in substance. Trinder v. Smedley, 522.

What may be given in evidence under general issue.

In an action for maliciously indicting the plaintiff without probable cause, the defendant may give evidence of probable cause under the general issue; and if, in addition to the plea of not guilty, he pleads pleads specially that he had probable cause, the Court will order such plea to be struck out. Cotton v. Browne, 312.

V. Replication.

1. How far it may divide plea and give separate answers to parts.

The first count of a declaration in trespass was for breaking plaintiff's close, and damaging certain chattels, on divers days, &c. The second was for damaging certain chattels, and destroying others, on one day.

The first plea, to both counts, gave colour to plaintiff, and made title in defendant under a demise from the owner of the fee, as to the close mentioned in the first count, and justified his entry, and the trespass to the chattels as encumbering the close, not averring identity of the chattels in the two counts. The second plea, to the second count, alleged possession by defendant of a close, and justified the trespass to the chattels as encumbering it.

The replication to the first plea, so far as it related to the first count, traversed the demise; and, so far as the plea related to certain of the chattels mentioned in the second count, replied de injuriâ; and, so far as it related to other of them, replied excess. The replication to the second plea, so far as it related to certain of the chattels mentioned in the second count, replied de injuriâ; and, so far as it related to certain other of them, replied excess. There were separate formal conclusions to all the distinct parts of the replication.

(1.) Held, on demurrer to the replication to each plea for putting several matters in issue, that the plaintiff might treat the first plea, with respect to the chattels, as pleaded separately to each count.

(2.) That the plaintiff was entitled to divide each plea, and to reply severally as to the different parts of each, and as to different chattels covered by each.

(3.) But that de injuriâ could not be replied, as to any chattels, to the first plea, which alleged title in the close.

(4.) That de injuriâ might be replied, as to the chattels, to the second plea, which alleged only possession of a close.

(5.) The replication was dated before the first day of Easter term 1834, when the rules Hil. 4 W. 4. came into effect; the replication to the first plea, and that to the second plea, each commenced in form as a replication to the whole plea; in each, the part replying excess contained no prayer of judgment, but only a verification followed by an &c.: Held bad on special demurrer.

(6.) Semble, that it would not have been bad, if the replication had been subsequent to the taking effect of the rules Hil. 4 W. 4.

(7.) But held, that the above faults did not make the replication bad as to the whole; and judgment was given for the plaintiff as to such parts of the replication as were good, and for the defendant as to the rest. Vision v. Jenkin, 741.

II. Maintenance of.

1. Adjudication of lunacy, how to be made.

An order of justices upon parish officers, for removing a person of unsound mind (not chargeable) to a house of

of reception for such persons, under stat. 9 G. 4. c. 40. ss. 38. & 44., is good, although it state that the justices have adjudged (and not do adjudge) the settlement of such person to be in the parish of, &c.

Such order is correct if it recites that the person is "so far disordered in his senses that it is dangerous for him to be permitted to go abroad," though the form given by the schedule to stat. 9 G. 4. c. 40., and referred to by sects. 38 & 44. (which provide for the making of such order), speaks only of a person being "lunatic, insane, or a dangerous idiot."

An order upon the overseers of the parish in which the lunatic is found to be settled, for the expense of his maintenance, &c. at such house of reception, must be prospective only. If it be retrospective in part, such part will be quashed. Rex v. St. Nicholas, Leicester, 79.

III. Settlement by apprenticeship. Power of overseers as to binding.

Under stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 5., and before stat. 56 G. 3. c. 139., parish officers had power to bind apprentice the child of a person settled in, and receiving relief from, the parish, the child being also settled in the parish, though such child, at the time of the binding, resided out of the parish, and was not a party to the indenture; and though the child at the time of such binding was not a burthen to the parish. And the binding was good under the former statute, though the master was neither an inhabitant nor occupier within the parish, provided he became a party to the indenture. Rex v. St George, Exeter, 373.

IV. Settlement by hiring and service. Exceptive hiring.

A question arising at sessions, as to an alleged settlement by hiring and service in a third parish, the sessions quashed the order of removal, subject to a case, in which the contract of hiring was set out, and the question for this Court was stated to be, whether the pauper gained a settlement by hiring and service in the third parish:

Held, that this left the question, whether the contract of hiring was exceptive or not, open to this Court.

Pauper was hired to work for a year, at 6s. a week, to work ten hours a day, from five in the morning till six in the evening; and afterwards it was agreed that he should receive additional pay for over work: Held to be an exceptive hiring; though the pauper never in fact refused to work over-hours when requested. Rex v. Norton Bavant, 161.

V. Settlement by serving office.

1. Where appointment to office not legally made. Manor, 1.
2. Office not for a year.

An office, to confer a settlement under stat. 3 W. & M. c. 11. s. 6. must be annual in its nature.

Therefore where an act of parliament authorised justices to appoint constables for such period as they should judge expedient, at a salary not exceeding 20l. per annum, it was held, that the person appointed gained no settlement, whether the appointment was or was not in fact for a year. Rex v. Middlewich, 156.

VI. Derivative settlement.

On appeal against a removal, the respondents proved that the pauper was born in the appellant parish; the appellants proved that his mother's maiden settlement was in a different parish; but neither side gave any evidence of the father's settlement, or of any attempt made to ascertain it:

Held that, as against the birth settlement relied upon by the respondents, proof of the mother's maiden settlement was sufficient to invalidate the order. Rex v. St. Mary, Leicester, 644.

2. Of entry of judgment.

(1.) What

(1.) What allowed.

The following variances in entering up a judgment, viz. that the plaintiff as to certain "counts," (instead of "issues") take nothing by his "bill," (instead of "writ,"), and that the "defendant," (instead of "defendants,") recover costs, &c. are clerical errors, which, when ascertained by comparison with the record of proceedings in the cause, the Court will amend, though the judgment be of a past term, and though a writ of error be pending in which these and other errors are assigned.

The Court refused to make such a rule absolute in the first instance.

The party moving must pay the adverse party his costs of such amendment. Paddon v. Bartlett, 887 (π).

It is not sufficient that he appears by counsel, and that, upon affidavits put in by other parties, it appears that he has given formal notice of his claim to the sheriff. Powell v. Lock, 515.

2. Entry of, upon what affidavits order may be obtained.

To obtain an order for entering an appearance under stat. 2 W. 4. c. 39. s. 3., it is not sufficient to state on affidavit that "diligent inquiry" has been made to find the defendant and his property; but the way in which inquiry has been made must be described, to satisfy the Court that proper means have been used to serve and execute the writ. Copeland v. Nevill, 658.

III. Arrest.

Discharge from.

The Court will not discharge a defendant out of custody on mesne process, on the ground merely that the arrest was against good faith. As where the plaintiff agreed to accept payment of his debt by instalments, and, without further communication, arrested the defendant before any instalment was due. Udall v. Nelson, 215.

IX. Declaration,

1. Time for declaring.

In actions commenced in any of the superior courts, the plaintiff may, since the Rule, Hil. 2 W. 4. I. 35., declare at any time before the end of a year from the return of the writ, unless the defendant shall have signed judgment of non-pros. for want of the plaintiff's declaring before the end of the second term; and this, whether the action be commenced by serviceable or bailable process. This applies also to causes removed by the defendant from inferior courts by habeas corpus, (though the cause was commenced below, and removed, before the Rule came into operation,) except that, as judgment of non-pros. cannot be signed in such causes, the plaintiff cannot be out of court till the expiration of the year.

And, consequently, an action for malicious arrest cannot be commenced in any of the above cases, till a year has elapsed from the return of the writ.

Quære,

Quære, whether such action lies, where the suit alleged to have determined has been removed by habeas corpus at the instance of the defendant. Norrish v. Richards, 733.

X. Elegit.

Inquisition on.

What examinable by Court on motion.

By inquisition, taken under an elegit, it was stated that G., the defendant, was possessed of a term in lands as mortgagee. The term had been bequeathed by words, upon which a question arose, whether such term were vested in G. or in the executrix. The Court refused to decide, on motion, at the instance of the mortgagor or of the executrix, whether G. had an interest of the nature described in the inquisition, and liable to be extended. *Cooper v. 2. Abandonment of.

A party taking out a summons for an order to be made by a Judge at chambers, may abandon the order when made. Therefore, where a Judge at chambers had indorsed on the summons the minutes of an order, and the party taking out the summons refused to draw up the order, or to deliver up the indorsed summons, the Court refused to compel him to do either, or to direct the Judge's clerk to draw up the order from the minutes of counsel. M'Dougall v. Nicholls, 813.

XVI. Judgment, entry of.

In an action of debt, for twenty years' rent, commenced July 22d, 1833, on an indenture of demise, the defendants pleaded, 1. Non est factum 2. (under stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 37. s. 42.) That no cause of action accrued within six years; which the plaintiff traversed. 3. and 4. As to seventeen years' and three quarters' rent, that on, &c. the plaintiff assigned over all his interest in the premises, and that no part of that rent became due before such assignment. To the last two pleas, the plaintiff pleaded non est factum. The jury found the first two issues for the plaintiff, without damages, and on the last two for the defendants. Judgment was entered up for the defendants:

Held, on error, by Tindal, C. J., and Lord Abinger, C. B., that, on this record, assuming the plea founded on the statute to be available, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for two years and a quarter's rent.

But, held by the whole Court of Error, that the plea was not available, for that stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 27. s. 42., as to actions for arrears of rent, is not retrospective.

Quære, whether the above section, in so far as it limits the bringing of actions for rent to six years after such rent becomes due, &c. be repealed by stat. 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 42. s. 3.?

Quære, whether the Court of Error in the Exchequer Chamber can grant a repleader? Paddon v. Bartlett, 884.

XXII. Stay of proceedings, order when granted.

An interlocutory judgment having been set aside, with costs against the plaintiff, by a Judge at chambers, and an attachment having issued for the non-non-payment, another Judge at chambers ordered that the defendant should have three days to rejoin, after the plaintiff should have purged his contempt. The Court refused to set this order aside, it not appearing that the plaintiff was in custody, or had paid the costs, or was unable to pay them. Wenham v. Downes, 450.

XXIII. Trial.

1. Short notice of.

Where the defendant in a country cause had obtained time to plead, on the usual condition of taking "short notice of trial if necessary;" and the plaintiff delivered a replication tendering issue, with notice of trial, to the defendant's agent in London, after post-time on the 27th of February, for the 3d of March, the commission day of the assizes, and on that day the trial took place, the defendant not being ready, or appearing; the Court, under special circumstances shewn by affidavit, held itself not precluded by the General Rule, Hil. 2 W. 4. I. 58. from granting a new trial. Pound v. Penfold, 655.

2. New trial, what points may be argued on motion for. Nonsuit.

XXIV. Verdict.

1. When nonsuit may be entered. Nonsuit.

2. How amount may be shewn.

On a motion for costs under stat. 43 G. 3. c. 46. s. 3. it is not necessary that the amount of the verdict should be stated in the affidavits, but it may be shewn by the Judge's notes. Van Nuyel v. Hunter, 243.

PRESCRIPTION.

2. How far evidence which shews custom is evidence of prescription. Custom, 3.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

1. What is evidence of relation of.

In an action for use and occupation of lands by the sufferance and permission of the plaintiffs, it appeared that the lands were let by auction by the plaintiffs, E. and T., who were auctioneers, to the defendant, under conditions which stated the letting to be "By E. and T., auctioneers." One of the conditions was, "The rent is to be paid into the hands of E. or T., auctioneers, or to their order, at two payments," &c. At the foot of the document was written, "Approved by me, David Jones." Jones was the tenant at the time of the sale. Nothing else appeared in the conditions to shew on whose behalf the letting was. The plaintiffs gave evidence to shew that Jones, being indebted to them, had authorised them to let the lands as above, pay the rent due to Jones's landlord, and retain any surplus in satisfaction of their own debt. Evidence to a contrary effect was given for the defendant. The Judge, in summing up, left it to the jury, whether the plaintiffs had let the lands on their own behalf and as creditors of Jones, or merely as his agents. The jury found a letting by the plaintiffs on their own behalf:

Held, that the conditions imported a letting by Jones, E. and T. acting as his agents; and that the document ought to have been so explained to the jury. And the Judge not having so explained it, a new trial was granted. Evans v. Evans, 132.

2. Salary recoverable by agent on dismissal.

A servant, discharged for improper conduct, cannot recover any part of the salary current from the last payday at the time of his dismissal.

A master, who has dismissed a servant, may justify the dismissal by shewing that at the time of the dismissal he knew the servant to have committed an act which justified it; and a jury ought not to be asked whether the master was induced to dismiss him by that act or by some other cause.

A clerk employed by a company to enter proceedings in their minute book, entered on the margin of the minute book a protest in his own name against a summons for appointing a successor to himself: Held, that a jury were justified in finding this to be a sufficient cause of dismissal.

A plaintiff declared that the defendants, a company, had employed him at a quarterly salary; the minute book of his appointment shewed an annual salary only, but several quarterly payments were proved, and no annual one. Semble, that no variance appeared.

Quære, per Coleridge J., whether, if a servant, hired for a year, be improperly dismissed in the middle of a year he can sue in assumpsit for the wages, for that year, or is confined to a special action for an improper dismissal. Ridgway v. Hungerford Market, 171.

1. A local act created a corporation, consisting of sworn commissioners, with summary powers of seizure of goods and imprisonment of the person, and of preventing and removing obstructions and nuisances in the streets; powers for paving, cleansing, and lighting; powers of appointing and paying officers, of determining the number of watchmen; of regulating them; and of dismissing, paying, or pensioning them; of possessing property in materials required under the act; of instituting prosecutions; of imposing rates; of appointing and removing treasurers, to whom penalties, imposed by the act, were to be paid for the purposes of the act; and of hearing appeals in certain cases brought by parties complaining of things done under the act: Held, that an information in the nature of a quo warranto would lie against persons claiming to be commissioners.

A part of the commissioners were elected by rated inhabitants, M. and T. having been candidates; and M. having been declared elected, and sworn in, and a rule nisi having been obtained, upon affidavits that T. had the legal majority, for a mandamus to certify T.'s election, and swear him in, the Court discharged it with costs, and at the same time granted a rule to shew cause why there should not be an information in the nature of a quo warranto against M. Rex v. Beedle, 467.

2. Held, by Littledale and Patterson Js., Lord Denman C. J. dubitante, that that a quo warranto information does not lie for the office of governor and director, elected annually by rated inhabitants, under a local act for the government of the poor, and the maintenance of the nightly watch; and having power to make orders to regulate the poor and the watching; to determine how much money shall be raised for the poor and the watch (for which amount the inhabitants are to make rates, subject to a power in the governors to rectify omissions or mistakes, and to an appeal at quarter sessions); to purchase and hold real and personal property, including all the money raised under the act; to erect buildings; to borrow money on the credit of the rates, for the purposes of the act; to appoint and remove treasurers, and salaried clerks, collectors, and other officers, who are to account to them; to appoint watchmen and beadles, who are to be sworn in as constables before a justice, and to be under their control; to name sixteen persons, from whom the justices are to select four overseers; and to sue and be sued in the name of one of themselves, or of their clerk. Rex v. Ramsden, 456.

3. Held, per Lord Tenterden C. J., Taunton and Patteson Js., (Parke J. dissentiente,) that a quo warranto information does not lie for the office of trustees under a public local act, elected as vacancies occur, by occupiers in the parish, and taking an oath of office, with power to appoint salaried treasurers, collectors, &c. of monies raised under the act, accountable to themselves; to pass bye-laws with penalties; to impose rates, in case of certain other functionaries not doing so; to supply omissions in the rates, and to relieve parties aggrieved or incompetent to pay; to appoint salaried watchmen; to purchase, hold, and manage certain property for the purposes of the act; to contract for the supply of the poor, remove nuisances, and apprehend for certain specified nuisances; to maintain the highways and prevent encroachments thereon; to superintend the lighting, paving, watching, and cleaning of the streets, &c., and to remove dangerous buildings, on complaint upon oath (which they were to administer); and to sue RATE.

1. County, accounts charged upon. (1.) Allowance of.

The stat. 4 & 5 W. 4. c. 48. s. 1. does not entitle rate-payers to take part in the allowance at sessions of accounts charged upon the county rate, nor to inspect the items at the time of such allowance; the statute not altering the nature of the authority by which the allowance is to be made, but merely directing that the business shall be transacted in public.

And the Court will not grant a mandamus for such inspection, on affidavit by a rate-payer, suggesting that the accounts had been examined by the justices at a private meeting, previously to the examination in open court, and alleging that the applicant demanded an inspection of the accounts at the sessions, and offered evidence to shew the impropriety of some of the charges, but was not allowed to interfere; and adding that he could now impugn the charges, if allowed the inspection. Rex v. Justices of Nottingham, 500.

2. Paving, recovery of, under Metropolis Paving Act. Statute, XXXVII.
3. Poor, rating under Local Act. Statute, XLII.
4. Sewage, who liable to.

Under the statutes of sewers, every person, whose property derives benefit from the works of the commissioners, is liable to be rated, although the benefit be not immediate.

Thus, where a case stated that the eastern wing of Somerset House was drained by the Board of Works, and had no communication with the common sewer running under the body of Somerset House, and being under the jurisdiction of the commissioners, and that the buildings derived no benefit from that sewer, except the general advantage of being accessible, and of the

the approaches and neighbouring public ways being properly drained and cleansed: it was held that the occupiers of the eastern wing were rateable for the common sewer.

Semble, that in an action of trespass against the commissioners for levying a rate, if it appeared that they had jurisdiction, the Court would not inquire whether the rate was proportioned to the benefit received from the sewage by the party rated.

Under the Sewers' Act, 52 G. 3. c. xlviii. (local and personal, public) s. 7, the party rated to the poor as the occupier of premises, is to be considered as the occupier for the purpose of assessment to the sewers' rate, although, in point of fact, the occupancy is questioned. *Soady v. SALE.

Interpretation of conditions.

The purchaser of lands by auction signed a memorandum of the contract, indorsed on the particulars and conditions of sale, and referring to them. Afterwards he wrote to the vendor, complaining of a defect in the title, referring to the contract expressly, and renouncing it. The vendor wrote and signed several letters, mentioning the property sold, the names of the parties, and some of the conditions of sale, insisting on one of them as curing the defect, and demanding the execution of the contract: Held, that these letters might be connected with the particulars and conditions of sale, so as to constitute a memorandum in writing, binding the vendor under stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 3. s. 4., although neither the original conditions and particulars, nor the memorandum signed by the purchaser, mentioned, or were signed by, the vendor.

On a sale of a leasehold interest of lands, described in the particulars as held for a term of twenty-three years, at a rent of 55*l*., and as comprising a yard, one of the conditions was, that if any mistake should be made in the description of the property, or any other error whatever should appear in the particulars of the estate, such mistake or error should not annul or vitiate the sale, but a compensation should be made, to be settled by arbitration. The yard was not, in fact, comprehended in the property held for the term at 55*l.*, but was held by the vendor from year to year, at an additional rent. It was essential to the enjoyment of the property leased for the twenty-three years. It did not appear that the vendor knew of the defect. Held, that this defect avoided the sale, and was not a mistake to be compensated for under the above condition; although, after the day named in the conditions for completing the purchase, and before action brought by the vendee, the vendor procured a lease of the yard for the term to the vendee, and offered it to him. Dobell v. Hutchinson, 355. (See whole placitum, Statute, V.) See also Principal and Agent, 1.

It is not necessary to revive a judgment by scire facias for the purpose of issuing execution after a year and a day, where the execution has been suspended by agreement of the parties.

Such agreement sufficiently appears, where the judgment is upon a warrant of attorney dated June 1824, empowering the plaintiff to enter up judgment at his pleasure, but stating, in the defeasance, that the warrant of attorney is given to secure payment of a certain sum, with costs of judgment if signed, on the 5th of December 1826. *Hiscocks v. SHERIFF.

1. Return of, how far conclusive.

In an action against a sheriff for escape of a prisoner arrested on meane process, the plaintiff proved the arrest by producing the sheriff's return of cepi corpus et paratum habeo: Held, that the latter words of the return produced by the plaintiff did not conclude him from proving the escape by parol evidence that the prisoner was at large after the return, and no bail bond lodged with the sheriff. Neck v. Humphery, 130.

2. Assignment of bail bond. Bail, 4. (1.)

Defendant being in the custody of the keeper of the prison of the sheriff of D., the keeper returned to a habeas corpus, that defendant was in his custody on a ca. sa. directed to the coroner of D., at the suit of plaintiff, which ca. sa. was set out in the return, with a certificate by the coroner that it was a true copy. It appeared by affidavit that the plaintiff was sheriff of D., but this did not appear in the ca. sa. or return, nor did it appear that there was any entry on the roll suggesting the fact. On motion to discharge the defendant for irregularity: Held, that it was not requisite that the ca. sa. should mention the fact of the plaintiff being sheriff; and that a suggestion might at any time have been made on the record, if it had been necessary, since the rule Hil. 2 W. 4. s. 95.

It appeared by affidavit that the defendant being in the sheriff's custody at the suit of S., the ca. sa. at the suit of B., the now plaintiff, was lodged with the keeper of the gaol; but no facts facts were deposed to otherwise connecting the coroner with the keeper. Held, that the defendant was regularly charged at the suit of B.; for that it would be intended that the writ came to the coroner's hands, and it was not necessary that he should make a formal warrant to the keeper.

The Court refused to discharge the defendant. Bastard v. Trutch, 451.

Recovery of rates under.

By an act for paving and lighting a parish, a certain committee was empowered to distrain for rates, and to sue for the amount, if there was no sufficient distress. The Metropolis Paving Act, 57 G. 3. c. xxix., subsequently quently passed, by sect. 38. enables any persons, having the control of the pavements of any parochial or other district within the jurisdiction of the act (of which districts the above parish was one), to sue for the recovery of the paving rates, and it imposes no condition as to previous distress. It further provides, that former paving acts shall not be repealed, but that commissioners under such acts shall retain and may exercise all the powers and authorities thereby conferred, and may act upon all and every the provisions, clauses, powers, and authorities of such acts, or of this act, as they shall find expedient.

Held, that the general power of suing given by the Metropolis Paving Act was extended to the committee established under the local act, and consequently that, in bringing actions, they were no longer restricted to the case in which no sufficient distress could be found. Rex v. Halls, 494.

Compensation under.

A railway company were empowered, by statute, to enter upon and use lands for the railway, and to purchase and hold lands; they were also bound to make such alterations as were necessary for the enjoyment of the railways then in use for a coal mine belonging to I., over the works of which the railway was to pass: the act was not to give them the mines under any land purchased by them; but the mine-owners might work them, doing no damage to the works of the company, or making good the same: the company was to compensate any party interested for any damage or inconvenience sustained by the execution of any of the works authorised by the act; such compensation to be assessed, if necessary, by a jury, which the company were required from time to time to summon, and which should assess compensation for damages already sustained, and for future temporary perpetual or recurring damages.

I., being owner of land over the said coal mine, and which land was leased to B., sold the land to the company, the coal mine not being taken into account. Afterwards B., in working the coal mine, damaged the railway, and was unable to work so profitably as he otherwise could, lest he should do further damage: Held, that B. was not entitled to compensation, either for the sum which it cost him to repair the damage done, or for the interruption to the working of his mine. Rex v. Leeds and Selby Railway, 683.

XLII. Monmouthshire Canal Act.

Rating under.

1. By a canal act (passed in 1799, when tolls were considered rateable per se), a company was incorporated, and authorised to take lands, and to take and erect buildings, for the purpose of constructing a canal and railways, and to take tolls; and it was provided that the tolls should not, at any time or times thereafter, be subject to taxes or rates, and that the company should, from time to time, be rated in respect of the lands and grounds to be taken, and the buildings to be erected by them, in the same proportion as, and not at any higher value or improved rent than, other lands, grounds, and buildings adjacent were or should, for the time being, be rated, and as the lands, grounds, and buildings, to be taken and erected by them, would have been rateable, in case they had continued in their former state, and not been used for the purposes of the undertaking. The adjacent lands and buildings improved in value, from the time of the commencement of the undertaking, partly in consequence of the undertaking being carried into effect, partly from independent causes: Held, that the land and buildings used for the canal were to be rated at the value which the adjacent lands, &c., bore at the time of the rate; and not at the value which these latter bore at the commencement of the undertaking, nor at that which they would have borne at the time of the rate if the undertaking had had not been carried into effect. Although, from the passing of the act to the time of the question being raised (forty years), the rate had always been made according to the original value of the lands adjacent.

2. A subsequent statute authorised the company to extend the canal, and to purchase lands for that purpose; and it provided, that they might take the like tolls on the new canal, &c. as under the former act, and have the like powers and remedies for recovering them. And that the clauses, powers, authorities, provisions, orders, rules, regulations, limitations, exemptions, restrictions, privileges, penalties forfeitures, punishments, and provisions contained in the former act, should, so far as the same would apply and the case would admit, extend to the new canal, &c. and should take effect, operate, be put in execution, used, and exercised by the company, and be applied and enforced in respect of making, maintaining, and using the new canal, &c. and regulating the navigation thereon, for punishing offences relating thereto, for purchasing lands and assessing damages, and with respect to all matters in anywise touching the new canal, &c. in the same manner to all intents and purposes as if the same clauses, &c., had been inserted, repeated, and enacted, at full length, by the subsequent act, and as if the new canal, &c. had been a part of the canal authorised to be made by the former act: Held, that the provision as to rating the original canal extended to the new part.

3. By a third statute, a tramroad company was incorporated, and it and the canal company were authorised to make railways, and to take such tolls on these railways as the canal company might take by the first statute; and it was provided, that the clauses, powers, authorities, regulations, &c. (as in the second statute), of the first statute, should extend (in the same terms as in the second) to the railways last-mentioned, and to regulating the carriage or conveyance of goods thereon, as if these railways had been authorised to be made by the first statute, and the tramroad company had been therein named instead of the canal company: Held, that the provision as to rating the original canal extended to these railways. Rex v. Monmouthshire Canal, 619.

XLIII. Sirhowy Tramroad Act.

Power to make railways.

An act of parliament empowered a canal company to construct certain canals and railroads, paying compensation to the owners of lands used; and also to make railroads to iron works, &c. within eight miles of the canals or railroads first mentioned; and it provided that, if the owners of certain species of property situate within eight miles from any part of the canals or railways before particularly described and authorised to be made, should think it expedient that railways should be made through the lands of other persons, for the purpose of conveying goods from the canals or railways before particularly described, and if the company should refuse to make such railways under the powers given them by the act, such owners might, at their own cost, make the railways, paying compensation to the proprietors of the lands over which they were to be made; and that the railways so made should be open to the public, on payment of such tolls as the company could demand.

A subsequent act incorporated a tramroad company, and gave them, or the canal company, power to make certain railways, and to take thereon the tolls authorised by the former act; and it provided, that the companies should have the same powers for recovering the tolls as were given by the first act; and that the several clauses, powers, authorities, regulations, limitations, exemptions, restrictions, privileges, penalties, forfeitures, punishments, and provisions therein contained, should, as far as the same would apply and the case would admit, extend to the works constructed under the new act, and should take effect, operate, and be put in execution and used and exercised, and be applied and enforced, in respect of the making, maintaining, and using the said works, and regulating the conveyance of goods thereon, for punishing offences relating thereto, and for purchasing and selling lands and ascertaining the value thereof, and determining and assessing damages, and with respect to all matters whatsoever in anywise concerning the works made under the new act, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if the same clauses, &c. had been repeated and enacted in the new act, and as if the works authorised by the new act had been part of the undertaking authorised by the first act, and as if the tramroad company had been therein named instead of the canal company:

Held, that this did not authorise owners of the specified kind of property within eight miles of the new works (unless authorised by the first act) to make railways, &c. from their property to the new works. Sirhowy Tramroad Company v. Jones, 640. (n.)

TROVER.

1. What is evidence of conversion.

To. an action of trover for wine, commenced, October 1833, the statute of limitations was pleaded. The wine, in pipe, had been deposited by C. for the plaintiff, in the defendant's cellar, by her leave. C. became bankrupt, and, his assignees claiming the wine, the plaintiff's solicitors warned the defendant, by letter, in December 1836, not to give it up to any person unauthorised by them. The defendant kept the wine, and bottled part of it at, or soon after, the end of 1836, at which time it was becoming injured by remaining in the wood. Afterwards, but it did not appear when, she consumed part of the wine so bottled. In November 1827, the plaintiff's solicitors again wrote to the defendant, saying that they were instructed to proceed at law against her, and referring to a demand of the wine, stated in the letter to have been made upon her by them in the preceding March, but of which there was no further evidence. They also offered to indemnify her against the claim of any other person, if she would deliver the wine within a week; in default of which they stated that the proceedings would be commenced. The application was not noticed. A subsequent demand and refusal were proved. The jury having found for the plaintiff:

Held, on motion to enter a nonsuit, that on this evidence the jury were not bound to conclude either that there had been a demand and refusal more more than six years before action brought: or that the defendant had bottled the wine with intent to convert it to her own use.

Semble, by Patteson and Coleridge Js., that if a bailee of wine draws off and converts part of it without the owner's knowledge, and at the end of six years is sued in trover for the whole quantity, he cannot set up his conversion of part as a conversion of the whole, to support a plea of the Statute of Limitations. *Philpott v.
